Corsair (kôr'sâr), The. A poem by Byron, published in 1814.

Corsairs. [From Pg. corsa, a course or cruise.] Sea-robbers, chiefly from the Barbary coast, who infested the Mediterranean for many centuries.

From the days when Barbarossa defied the whole strength of the Emperor Charles V., to the early part of the present century, when prizes were taken by Algerine rovers under the guns, so to say, of all the fleets of Europe, the Corsairs were masters of the narrow seas, and dictated their own terms to all comers. Nothing but the creation of the large standing navies of the present age crippled them; nothing less than the conquest of their too convenient coasts could have thoroughly suppressed them. During these three centuries they levied blackmail upon all who had any trading interest in the Mediterranean. The Venetians, Genoese, Pisans in older days, the English, French, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, and American Governments in modern times, purchased security by the payment of a regular tribute, or by the periodical presentation of costly gifts. The penalty of resistance was too well known to need exemplification. Thousands of Christian slaves in the bagnios of Algiers bear witness to the consequences of an independent policy. So long as the nations of Europe continued to quarrel among themselves, instead of presenting a united line of battle to the enemy, such humiliations had to be endured; so long as a Corsair raid upon Spain suited the policy of France; so long as the Dutch, in their bombing of other states, could declare that Algiers was necessary to them, there was no chance of the plague subsiding; and it was not till the close of the great Napoleonic wars that the Powers agreed, at the Congress of Aix la Chapelle in 1818, to act together, and do away with the scourge of Christendom. And even then little was accomplished till France combined territorial aggrandizement with the work of civilizing Barbary.

Poole, Story of the Barbary Corsairs, p. 3.

Corse (kôrs), John Murray. Born at Pittsburg, Pa., April 27, 1835; died at Boston, April 27, 1893. An American general. He graduated at West Point in 1857, but immediately resigned his position in the army. At the outbreak of the Civil War he entered the Union army as a major of volunteers. He commanded a division at Memphis; was commissioned brigadier-general in 1863; served in the Chattanooga campaign; participated in the battles of Chickamauga and Missionary Ridge; commanded a division in Sherman's march to the sea; gallantly defended Allatoona against a largely superior force of the enemy Oct. 5, 1864, and was made brevet major-general in 1864. He was collector of internal revenue at Chicago 1867–68, and was subsequently a banker in Boston.

Cor Serpentis (kôr sèr-pen'tis). [L. (NL.), 'the heart of the serpent': cor = E. heart.] The second-magnitude star α Serpentis, more often called Unukalhai.

Corsica (kôr'si-kä). [F. Corse.] An island in the Mediterranean, forming a department of France: the Greek Cyrnus (Κύρνος). It is separated from Sardinia by the strait of Bonifacio, and lies about 50 miles west of Tuscany. Its surface is mountainous, its highest summit being Monte Rotondo, 8,892 feet above the sea-level. Timber, etc. The capital is Ajaccio, and the chief town Bastia. The language is Italian. It was acquired by the Romans at the end of the first Punic war, and successively held by the Vandals, Goths, Franks, Saracens, and Pisans, and from the 14th century by the Genoese. It was acquired by France in 1768. The revolt of the Corsican Paoli in 1793 placed Corsica under British rule; but it was reunited by France in 1796. It is noted for its vendettas. It was the birthplace of Napoleon I. Length, 114 miles. Width, 52 miles. Area, 3,377 square miles. Population (1891), 288,586.

Corsican Brothers, The. A translation by Charles Webb of a popular French play, "Les frères corses." The plot turns on the mysterious sympathy between Louis and Fabian dei Franchi, who are twin brothers.

east of Milan. Here, in 1237, the emperor Frederick II. defeated the Lombards.

Cortereal (kôr-tā-rā-äl'). Gaspar. Born about 1450. A Portuguese navigator. He explored Labrador and Newfoundland in 1500, and in 1501 undertook a second voyage to the same regions, in the course of which he died.

Cortes (kôr'tes). [Sp., 'courts.'] 1. The national assembly or legislature of Spain, consisting of a senate and chamber of deputies. The Senate is composed of not over 360 members, one half princes of the blood, grandees, and certain ex-officio and nominated members, and one half elected. The Chamber of Deputies is composed of members in the proportion of one for every 50,000 inhabitants, elected for five years.

2. The parliament or legislature of Portugal, consisting of an upper house of hereditary, life, and elective peers, and a lower house of 173 deputies, elected by the people for four years.

Cortés (kor-tās'), or Cortez (kôr'tez), Hernando, or Hernan, or Fernando. Born at Medellin, Estremadura, Spain, 1485; died at Castillejo de la Cuesta, near Seville, Dec. 2, 1547. A famous Spanish soldier and conqueror of Mexico. In 1504 he went to Espanola, and in 1511 to Cuba where he married. In 1518 Velasquez gave him command of 12 vessels and 508 soldiers, destined to follow up Grijalva's discoveries. Having landed at Tabasco, Velasquez wished to recall him at the last moment, but Cortés evaded him and finally left Cuba Feb. 18, 1519. Rounding Yucatan, he had conflicts with the Indians of Tabasco and Tlascala, and founded Vera Cruz in April and in Aug. began his march to Mexico City, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the messengers of Montezuma, the chief or "emperor" of that city. Montezuma did not directly resist him, but he had to fight several severe battles (Sept.) with the independent Tlascalans, who eventually joined him with a large force. At Cholula (Oct. 18) he executed a great number of natives as a punishment for a real or supposed conspiracy, and on Nov. 8 marched over the lake causeway into Mexico, Montezuma coming out to meet him. The Spaniards were hospitably lodged in splendid rich presents; but on the rumor of an uprising Cortes seized and held Montezuma as a hostage. Velasquez having sent Panfilo de Narvaez in pursuit of Cortes, the latter left 150 men under Alvarado, made a rapid march, defeated and captured Narvaez at Cempoala May 28, 1520, and enlisted most of his men. On his return to Mexico the Spaniards closely besieged by the Mexicans, who had at last risen in arms. Cortés and his men were allowed to march in, but the fight was at once renewed. The captive Montezuma was killed by a shower of stones while attempting to parley; and on the night of June 30 the Spaniards tried to leave the city secretly. They were discovered, and lost half their force, and most of the treasure they had collected, in a fierce battle on one of the causeways; still hotly pursued, they fought another great battle at Otumba July 7, finally escaping into Tlascala. Here Cortés recruited his army, receiving many Indian allies; and, aided by ships which he built on the lakes, began the siege of Mexico in Dec., 1520. Under Guatemotzin the city was desperately defended, and most of it was leveled with the ground before it was taken: Guatemotzin was captured Aug. 13, 1521. After this success, Cortés was empowered by the emperor to conquer all of New Spain, and in 1523 he was made governor. Mexico was rebuilt. Expeditions were sent in various directions, and navigation of the Pacific commenced. In the interval, however, Cortés was superseded overland to that region (Oct., 1524, to April, 1526), enduring terrible sufferings. During this long absence his enemies gained power: he was also accused from the governorship July, 1526, and in 1528 went to Spain to seek redress. Charles V. received him with high honor: he was made marquis of the Valley of Oaxaca (Mexico) and captain-general of New Spain, but was not restored to the governorship. His first wife having died, he married a lady of noble birth, and in 1530 returned to Mexico, where he lived in great splendor on the vast estates granted him. But the machinations of his enemies continued; his explorations of the west coast (1533–39) were greatly hampered; and in 1540 he again went to Spain to seek redress. In 1541 he was with the emperor in the Algerine campaign. Charles refused or put off his demands, and, despairing of redress, Cortés was about preparing to go back to Mexico when he died. His honors, by failure of the direct line with his great-grandson, have passed to the dukes of Terranova and Monteleone, in Sicily; his Mexican estates have several times been sequestrated, but portions are now held by the heirs.

Cortés, José Domingo. Born about 1830: died 1884. A Chilian author. He was long a journalist, subsequently attaché at Brussels, and finally government director of libraries in Bolivia. Among his numerous biographical and historical works are the "Diccionario biografico Americano," "Poetas Americanos," "Historia de Bolivia," and "Estadistica bibliografica de Bolivia."

Cortés, Martin. Born in Mexico, 1532: died in Spain, Aug. 13, 1589. The legitimate son of Hernando Cortés. He went to Spain in 1540, was liberally educated, followed the court of Philip II. to Flanders and England, and served with distinction in the army. He inherited the title of Marques del Valle, and most of the Mexican estates were restored to him. In 1562 he went to Mexico, where he lived in great splendor until July, 1566, when he was accused of conspiracy, with the brothers Avila to make himself king. (See Avila, Alonzo de.) He was sent to Spain, but was exonerated after several years. His illegitimate brother, of the same name, was involved in the accusation and horribly tortured.

Cortés, Sea of. A name given, in maps and books of the 16th century, to the Gulf of California, in honor of Hernando Cortés, one of its first explorers.

Corteze (kor-tā'ze), II. [It., 'The Courteous.'] A famous Italian book of manners, written by Baldessare Castiglione. It was translated into English in 1561 by Sir Thomas Hoby.

Cos, or Kos (kos). [Gr. Κός, Κόος, mod. Gr. *Κως*ῆ: It. Stanko, Stanchio.] An island in the Ægean Sea, belonging to Turkey, situated west of Asia Minor in lat. 36° 50′ N., long. 27° 5′ E. It is celebrated as the birthplace of Apelles, Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Hippocrates, and also for its vineyards. Area, about 95 square miles. Population, about 20,000.

Cosa (kō'sä), Juan de la. Date of birth unknown; died near the Bay of Cartagena, Nov., 1509. A Spanish navigator, one of the most skilful of his time. He was with Columbus in the voyage of 1493 and during the exploration of Cuba, and he made at least five voyages to the northern coast of South America, viz., with Ojeda, May, 1499, to June, 1500; with Bastidas, Oct., 1500, to Sept., 1502; in command of successful expeditions in search of gold, etc., 1504 to 1506, and 1506 to 1508; and finally with Ojeda in 1509, when he was killed by the Indians. Of La Cosa's charts two or three have come down to us. His map of the New World, made in 1500, is the oldest known. It is now the property of the Spanish government.

Cosegüina (kō-sä-gō-ē'nä). A volcano at the extreme western end of Nicaragua, situated on a peninsula between the Gulf of Fonseca and the Pacific. It is less than 4,000 feet high, but is remarkable for one of the most violent eruptions ever recorded. This began on Jan. 20, 1835, and for several days the cloud of ashes darkened the country to a distance of from 60 to 100 miles from the crater; to the west the fall was 3 feet thick, and was carried by the wind to Jamaica, Oaxaca in Mexico, and Bogotá in Colombia. The explosions are said to have been heard in Mexico.

Cosenza (kō-sen'dzä). 1. A province in Calabria, Italy. Also called Calabria Citeriore. Area, 2,568 square miles. Population (1891), 464,510.—2. The capital of the province of Cosenza, Italy, situated in lat. 39° 19′ N., long. 16° 18′ E.: the ancient Consentia. It contains a cathedral. The city suffers greatly from earthquakes. Alaric died near here in 410. Population (1891), commune, 29,000.

He was appointed master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, in 1635, vice-chancellor of Cambridge University in 1639, dean of Peterborough in 1640, and bishop of Durham in 1660. He was a churchman of the school of Laud, and an active Royalist during the civil war; and in 1644 was obliged to retire to Paris, where he became chaplain to the household of Queen Henrietta Maria. After the Restoration he returned to England, and rose to a position of great influence in the church.

Cosmas (kos'mas) and Damian (dā'mi-an), Saints. Two martyrs famous in the Eastern Church. They worked as physicians and missionaries. They were beheaded under Diocletian. A basilica was built in their honor at Constantinople by Justinian, and one at Rome by Felix II.

Cosmas (kos'mas) of Prague. Born about 1045; died Oct. 21, 1125. A Bohemian priest and historian, author of "Chronica Boemorum," the oldest history of Bohemia.

Cosmas, surnamed Indicopleustes. [Gr. Κοσμᾶς Ἰνδικοπλεύστης, 'the Indian voyager'.] Lived in the 6th century A. D. An Egyptian monk and traveler, author of a work on geography and theology, "Topographia Christiana."

Cosmati (kos-mā'tē), A family or school of Roman architects who originated the style of decorated architecture called "Cosmatesque" about the middle of the 12th century. It flourished for more than 150 years. The beauty of the work depends mainly upon the skilful combination of mosaics, disks of porphyry, and many-colored marbles found among the ruins of Rome. The principal members of the family were Piero, Odericus, Giovanni, Adeodatus, and Peregrine. Examples of their work are the cloisters of Civita Castellana, the cloisters of San Paolo, and the portico and pulpit of San Lorenzo.

Cosne (kōn). A town in the department of Nièvre, France, situated on the Loire 33 miles north of Nevers: the ancient Condate. Population (1891), commune, 8,672.

Cossacks (kos'aks). [Said to be of Tatar origin.] A military people inhabiting the steppes of Russia along the lower Don and about the Dnieper, and in lesser numbers in eastern Russia, Caucasia, Siberia, and elsewhere. Their origin is uncertain, but their nucleus is supposed to have consisted of refugees from the ancient limits of Russia, forced by hostile invasion to the adoption of a military organization of order, which grew into a more or less tribal existence. Their independent spirit has led to numerous unsuccessful revolts, ending in their subjection, although they retain various privileges. As light cavalry they form an element in the Russian army very valuable in skirmishing operations and in the protection of the frontiers of the empire.

Cossacks, The. A novel by L. Tolstoi, published 1852. It was translated into English in 1878.

Cossé (kō-sā'), Charles de (Comte de Brissac). Born in Anjou, France, about 1505; died at Paris, Dec. 31, 1563. A marshal of France. He was present at the siege of Naples in 1528, served against the English and Imperialists in Champagne and Flanders 1543–46, and became grand-master of the artillery in 1547, and marshal of France in 1550.

Cosseans (ko-sē'anz). A wild and warlike people formerly inhabiting the Zagros Mountains northeast of Babylon. They are mentioned by Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, and others, and are probably identical with the Kassi or Kossæi of the cuneiform inscriptions. About the year 1760 B. C. they invaded Babylonia, ruling the country for several centuries; and as late as the time of Nebuchadnezzar (604–561) an expedition against them is recorded. Possibly they, and not the Ethiopians, are meant by Cush (to be read Cushi) in many passages of the Old Testament (e. g. Gen. x. 7, 8, where, among the descendants of "Cush," Nimrod and the founders of other Semitic tribes appear.

Cossimbazar (kos'sim-ba-zär'). A former important city of India, near Murshidabad.

Cossova. See Kossovo.

Cossutius (ko-sū'shius). A Roman architect who, under Antiochus Epiphanes (176 to 164), built a large part of the temple of Zeus at Athens, begun in the time of Pisistratus and finished in that of Hadrian.

Costa (kos'tä), Claudio Manuel da. Born at Carmo, Minas Geraes, June 6, 1729; died at Villa Rica (now Ouro Preto), 1760. A Brazilian poet. He was a lawyer in Villa Rica. In 1789 he was arrested for taking part in the conspiracy of Tiradentes, and a few days after he committed suicide in prison. His name is famous and his goods and books were confiscated, but his sonnets and songs, published long after his death, have placed him in the first rank among Portuguese poets.

Costa, Sir Michael. Born at Naples, Feb. 4, 1810; died at West Brighton, England, April 29, 1884. A noted musician, composer of operas, oratorios, ballets, etc., and musical director. He wrote the oratorios "Eli" (1855), "Naaman" (1864), etc. The greater part of his life was spent in England.

Costa Cabral (kos'tä kä-brāl'). Antonio Bernardo da, Duke of Thomar. Born at Fornos de Algodres, Beira, Portugal, May 9, 1803; died at San Juan de Flor, Sept. 1, 1889. A Portuguese statesman. He was minister of justice and ecclesiastical affairs 1839–42, and of the interior 1842–46. In the latter year he was overthrown by a popular uprising against his tyranny and misgovernment. He was prime minister again 1849–51.

Costa Carvalho (kos'tä kär-vāl'yō), José da. Born at Penha, Bahia, Feb. 7, 1796; died at Rio de Janeiro, Sept. 18, 1860. A Brazilian statesman. He was a member of the constituent assembly of 1822, and deputy in several successive parliaments. At first an ardent liberal, he went over to the conservatives in 1838. He was senator from 1838, and organized the conservative cabinet of 1848. This ministry is remarkable in South American history as having directed the war which ended in the downfall of Rosas. Costa Carvalho was successively named baron, viscount, and marquis of Monte Alegre.

Costanoan (kōs-tä'nō-an). [From Sp. costano, coastman.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians, whose territory extended from the Golden Gate, California, to a point below Monterey Bay, and thence to the mountains in the vicinity of Mt. Diablo. Its eastern boundary followed an irregular line from the southern end of Salinas Valley to Gilroy Hot Springs and the upper waters of Coyotemalya creek; thence along the San Joaquin to its mouth. The area was thus bounded by Suisun Bay, Carquinez Straits, San Pablo and San Francisco bays, and the Golden Gate. Prior to the Spanish mission period the stock comprised the people of the Ahwaste, Altahmo, Antintae, Carquin, Matsun, Olhone, Romonan, Rumsen, Thamien, and Tulomo tribes. There were about 50 survivors at Santa Cruz and Monterey in 1888.

Costard (kos'tärd). A character in Shakspere's "Love's Labour 's Lost," a clownish peasant.

Costa Rica (kos'tä ré'kä). [Sp., 'the rich coast.'] The southernmost of the republics of Central America, bounded by Nicaragua on the north, the Caribbean Sea on the east, Colombia on the south, and the Pacific on the west and southwest. Capital, San José. The surface is generally mountainous, and the chief export is coffee. The language is Spanish; the religion is Roman Catholic; and the government is republican, the executive being a president and congress consisting of a single house. Costa Rica was discovered by Columbus in 1502. Diego de Nicuesa failed in an attempt to colonize it in 1506. The first settlement was made by Francisco Hernandez in 1523, and the country was conquered by Alvarado about 1525. Independence was declared in 1821, and the territory formed part of the federal republic of Central America from 1823 to 1839. Area (official), 22,396 or, by planimetric calculation, 20,873 square miles. Population (1892), 243,205.

Costello (kos-tel'ō), Dudley. Born in Sussex, England, 1803; died at London, Sept. 30, 1865. A British soldier, novelist, journalist, and miscellaneous writer. He wrote "A Tour through the Valley of the Meuse, with the Legends of the Walloon Country and the Ardennes" (1845), "Piedmont and Italy, from the Alps to the Fiber" (1850-61), etc. He served as ensign in the West Indies, retiring on half pay in 1825; later he was foreign correspondent of the "Morning Herald" and the "Daily News."

Costello, Louise Stuart, Born in Ireland, 1799: died at Boulogne, April 24, 1870. A British writer and miniature-painter, sister of Dudley Costello. She wrote "Songs of a Stranger" (1825), "A Summer among the Bocages and Vines" (1840), "Gabrielle, or Pictures of a Reign" (1843), "The Rose Garden of Persia" (1845), etc.

Coster, or Koster (kos'tėr), Laurens Janszoon. [Laurens son of Jan, surnamed (D.) Koster, the sexton.] A citizen of Haarlem who, according to Hadrianus Junius in his "Batavia" (1588), invented the art of printing with movable types, about 1440 (?). The claims of Coster (whose identity is uncertain) to the discovery have been maintained with great confidence by the Dutch and in other quarters, but are probably invalid. See Gutenberg.

There is no mention of Coster as a printer earlier than the year 1560, when it was placed on a pedigree then made for Gerrit Thomaszoon, one of Coster's descendants, who had kept an inn in the house declared to be the birthplace of the art of printing. Here it is said of an ancestor who was Coster's son-in-law, Thomas Pieterzoon, that "his second wife was Lourens Janszoon Coster's daughter, who brought the first print into the world in the year 1446." The figure 6 in that entry has been partially rubbed out and transformed into 0. Observation of this fact caused Dr. Van der Linde to make elaborate investigations in the town and church of Haarlem, and he found, extending over the years from 1441, entries of payments to Lourens Janszoon Coster (son of a Jan Coster who died in 1456), for oil and soap, and for the tallow candles burnt during each year in the Town Hall. After 1447, Lourens Janszoon Coster, having given up his business as a tallow chandler to his sister, Aleydt, Jan Coster's daughter, returned tavern-keeper. He was paid in 1451 for wine sent to the burgomaster; in 1454 he was credited with seventeen quilders for "3 dinner-offerts" to the court of justice vant on the 8th day of October, 1453, at Lou Coster's"; in 1475 Lourens Janszoon Coster paid a fine for buyten drinken (drink out the premises); and the last entry is that in 1483 he paid forty-five of his goods when he left the town. The books of an old Haarlem dining association, the Holy Christmas Corporation, represent Lourens, the son of Jan Coster, inheriting a chair in the Corporation dining-hall there in 1436, and having given up the chair in 1484, with due appearance in 1497 of Gerrit Thomaszoon, who retained also the inn, as a successor to this festive inheritance. Lourens Janszoon Coster, the man first credited in Gerrit Thomaszoon's pedigree with the invention of printing, was, therefore, first a chandler, then a prosperous tavern-keeper; the wine vessels cast out of his types were the old pewter flagons proper to the tavern; and this man has been wrongly confounded with Lourens Janszoon, whose name was not Coster, but who was a rich wine merchant and innkeeper, town councillor, sheriff, treasurer and governor of the Hospital, who died in 1439.

He drew up, at the request of the General Court, an abstract of the laws of Moses, entitled "Moses, his judicials," which he handed to the court in October, 1636; and is said to have introduced in New England the practice of keeping the Sabbath from Saturday to that of Sunday.

Cotton, Sir Robert Bruce. Born at Denton, Huntington, England, Jan. 22, 1571: died May 6, 1631. A noted English antiquary, a graduate of Cambridge (Jesus College) in 1585, famous as the founder of the Cottonian Library, now in the British Museum. He was an ardent collector of manuscripts in many languages, coins, and antiquities of all kinds, and his library was consulted and his aid obtained by Bacon, Jonson, Speed, Camden, and many other men of learning of that day. His collection of original documents became so great as to be regarded as a source of danger to the government, and after he had fallen into disfavor at court, on political grounds, an opportunity was found of placing his library under seal (1629), and he never regained possession of it. His son, Sir Thomas Cotton, succeeded in obtaining it, and it remained in the family (though open to the use of scholars and, in 1700, of the public) until 1707, when it was purchased by the nation. It was kept at various places, suffering considerable damage by fire Oct. 28, 1731, until the founding of the British Museum (1753), when it was transferred to that institution. Cotton was knighted in 1603, and created a baronet in 1612.

Council of Basel. See Basel, Council of.

Council of Blood, The. In the history of the Netherlands, a court established by the Duke of Alva to suppress the popular agitation against the religious and political tyranny of Philip II. It held its first session Sept. 20, 1567, and put to death 1,800 persons in less than three months, the counts of Egmont and of Hoorn being among its victims (1568).

Yet, strange to say, this tremendous court . . . had not been provided with even a nominal authority from any source whatever. The King had granted it no letters patent or commission, nor had even the Duke of Alva thought it worth while to grant any commissions, either in his own name or as Captain General, to any of the members composing the board. The Blood-Council was merely an informal club, of which the Duke was perpetual president, while the other members were all appointed by himself.
Motley, Dutch Republic.

Council of Carthage, Chalcedon, etc. See Carthage, Chalcedon, etc.

Council of Five Hundred. In French history, during the government of the Directory (1795–99), an assembly of 500 members, forming the second branch of the legislative body, the first branch being the Council of Ancients.

Council of State. [F. Conseil d'État.] In France, an advisory body existing from early times, but developed especially under Philip IV. (1285–1314) and his sons. It was often modified, particularly in 1497, and in 1630 under Richelieu, and played an important part during the first empire. Under the present republican government it comprises the ministers and about 30 other members, part of whom are nominated by the president, and the remainder are elected by the legislative Assembly. Its chief duties are to give advice upon various administrative matters and legislative measures.

Council of Ten. In the ancient republic of Venice, a secret tribunal instituted in 1310 and continuing down to the overthrow of the republic in 1797. It was composed at first of 10 and later of 17 members, and exercised unlimited power in the supervision of internal and external affairs, often with great rigor and oppressiveness.

Council of the Indies. A body created in 1511, by King Ferdinand, for the regulation of Spanish colonial affairs. Its powers were confirmed and enlarged by Charles V. and his successors until they covered every branch of administration. It nominated and removed viceroys and governors, bishops and archbishops; made or approved all laws relating to the colonies, appointed the audiences, which were the supreme courts in all criminal affairs, and was itself the last court of appeal in civil cases; regulated the condition of the Indians; and, in fact, represented the crown in all matters relating to America and the East Indies. Its seat, after the first few years, was in Madrid.

Counter, The. The name anciently given to two prisons under the rule of the sheriffs of London, one in the Poultry and one in Wood street. There was another in Southwark which had the same name. This name was formerly a frequent subject of joke and pun. Baret, in the "Alvearie" (1573), speaks of one who had been imprisoned "as under the counter-tenor," and there are various similar allusions in the 17th-century dramatists.

Count Athon. See Ferdinand.

Count Julian. A tragedy by Walter Savage Landor, published in 1812.

His [Landor's] first dramatic effort, made after a stormy and ill-regulated experience of fifteen years, was the gloomy but magnificent tragedy of "Count Julian" [1812]. Like Southey's "Roderick," "Count Julian" is a modern adaptation of "Wallenstein," it is a dramatic poem rather than a stage drama of the available kind. Compared with Landor's predecessors of the time, however, it stands like the "Prometheus" among classic plays; and as an exposition of dramatic force, a conception of the highest manhood in the most heroic and mournful attitude,—as a presentment of inspired language, pathetic sentiment, and stern resolve,—it is an impressive and undying poem.
Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 41.

Count Robert of Paris. A novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1831. The scene is laid in the 11th century, when Godfrey of Bouillon was before Constantinople at the head of the Crusaders. Count Robert was a French Crusader, one of the most famous and reckless of the period.

Court of Lions. A celebrated court in the Alhambra. See the extract.

Perhaps the most celebrated portion of the entire palace [Alhambra] is the Court of the Lions, which occupies a space somewhat smaller than that of the Court of the Myrtles. One hundred and twenty-eight white marble columns, arranged by threes and fours in symmetrical fashion, support galleries which rise to no very lofty height; but the extreme grandeur and elegance of their varied capitals, the delicate traceries, the remnants of gold and colour, the raised orange-shaped cupolas, the graceful minarets, the innumerable arches, beautiful in their labyrinthine design, the empty basin into which the twelve stiff and unnatural "lions" once poured their constant streams of cooling waters, the alabaster reservoir, constitute a whole that poetry and romance have lauded even to extravagance. Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 237.

Court of Love, The. A poem attributed to Chaucer by Stowe, and inserted in the 1561 edition, but believed to be of later origin.

Courtois (kōr-twä'), Jacques, It. Jacopo Cortese: called le Bourguignon, It. Il Borgognone. Born at St. Hippolyte, Doubs, France, 1621: died at Rome, 1676. A French battle-painter. In 1655 he became a lay brother of the Jesuit order, and thereafter painted sacred subjects.

Couston (kös-tō'), Guillaume. Born at Lyons, April 25, 1677: died at Paris, Feb. 20, 1746. A French sculptor, younger brother of Nicholas Couston. He won the grand prix de sculpture in 1697, and was sent to Rome. He became celebrated for his bold and independent style. Among his works are the allegorical figures of the Seine and the Mediterranean at Marly, the colossal statue of the Rhône at Lyons, those of Bacchus, Minerva, Hercules, and Pallas, and agreat number of bas-reliefs. His son Guillaume Couston (born 1716: died July 13, 1777) was also a sculptor of note.

Coustou, Nicholas. Born at Lyons, Jan. 9, 1658: died at Paris, May 1, 1733. A French sculptor. He learned the rudiments of his art from his father, a wood-carver, and at eighteen entered the atelier of Coyzevox, then president of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture in Paris. He won the grand prix de sculpture in 1682, and went to Rome. Among his works are a Descent from the Cross, at Notre Dame; the colossal Seine and Marne, in the Tuileries Gardens; and many statues in the Tuileries and Versailles. He became a member of the Academy in 1693.

Coutances (kö-tons'). A town in the department of Manche, France, 40 miles south of Cherbourg: the Roman Constantia (whence the name). It has a noted cathedral, one of the chief churches of Normandy. The front is fine, with large recessed portal, pointed traceried window above on the nave, graceful arcades and rosettes, and the tall spires characteristic of Normandy. There is a high central tower and lantern. The interior is beautiful, important parts of the vistas formed by the openings of the choir-chapels are highly picturesque. The vaulting and decorative arcading are notably good. Coutances was the ancient capital of Coten tin, and suffered in the Norman, English, and religious wars. Population (1891), commune, 8,145.

Couthon (kö-tōn'), Georges. Born at Orcet, near Clermont, France, 1756: guillotined at Paris, July 28, 1794. A French revolutionist. He was deputy to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and to the Convention in 1792, and was one of the Triumvirate with Robespierre and Saint-Just. The three were executed at the same time.

Coutras (kö-trä'). A town in the department of Gironde, France, on the Dronne 25 miles east of Bordeaux. Here, Oct. 20, 1587, a victory was gained by Henry of Navarre over the Leaguers. It contained a notable castle, now destroyed. Population (1891), commune, 4,251.

Coutts (köts), Thomas. Born at Edinburgh, Sept. 7, 1753: died at London, Feb. 24, 1822. An English banker, the founder, with his brother James, of the banking-house known as Coutts and Co. He was the son of Lord Provost John Coutts of Edinburgh. His third daughter, Sophia, married Sir Francis Burdett.

He won the second grand prix de Rome in 1837. He first exhibited in the Salon in 1840 ("Jeune Vénitien après une orgie"). Among his works are "Les Romains de la décadence," "Une vraie," "Le retour des champs" (1845), "Le trouvère" (1844), "Joconde" (1847), etc. His chief work is "Les Romains de la décadence" (1847).

Covent Garden (kuv'ent gär'den). [For Convent Garden.] A space in London, between the Strand and Longacre, which as early as 1222 was the convent garden belonging to the monks of St. Peter, Westminster. It was originally called Frere Pye Garden. (Hare.) At the Dissolution it was held with existing properties by Edward VI., to Edward, duke of Somerset. After his attainder in 1552 it went to John, earl of Bedford. The earl of Bedford laid out for himself, and for Bedford, and partly built by Inigo Jones, whose church, St. Paul's, Covent Garden, still remains. The holdings of the Bedfords in this neighborhood were enormous. Its coffee-houses and taverns became the fashionable lounging-places for the authors, wits, and noted men of the kingdom. Dryden, Otway, Steele, Fielding, Peg Woffington, Kitty Clive, Samuel Foote, Booth, Garrick, and others were among its frequenters. See Covent Garden Market.

Covent Garden Journal. A biweekly periodical issued in Jan., 1752, by Henry Fielding, under the name of "Sir Alexander Drawcansir, Knight, Censor of Great Britain." It was discontinued before the end of the year.

Covent Garden Market. A vegetable, fruit, and flower market held in Covent Garden. The space began to be used for this purpose early in the 17th century by the venders from the villages near by. The market finally grew into a permanent institution, but till 1828 it was an unsightly assemblage of sheds and stalls. About that time the Duke of Bedford erected the present building. In 1859 a flower-market 200 yards with glass was built on the south side of the opera-house.

Covent Garden Theatre. A theater in Bow street, Covent Garden, built by John Rich, the famous harlequin of Lincoln's Inn Theatre, in 1731. It was opened, under the patent granted by Charles II. to Sir William Davenant, with Congreve's comedy "The Way of the World," Dec. 7, 1732. There was no first appearance at this house of any importance until that of Peg Woffington in "The Recruiting Officer," Nov. 8, 1740. In 1746 Garrick played here. During Rich's management pantomime reigned supreme. Rich died in 1761; leaving the theater to his son-in-law John Beard the vocalist. In 1767 it was sold to George Colman the elder. Harris, Rutherford, and Powell for £60,000. On March 15, 1773, Goldsmith's play "She Stoops to Conquer" was brought out here. In 1774 Harris undertook the management alone. In 1803 John Kemble bought a one-sixth share in the patent-right from Harris for £22,000, and became manager. In Sept., 1808, the house was burned. Eight months later it was rebuilt, according to the design of Smirke the architect, in imitation of the Parthenon (the pediment by Flaxman), at a cost of £300,000. John Philip Kemble was still manager. On account of the great expense of the undertaking Kemble raised the price of admission and built an extra row of boxes which he leased for £12,000 (?). This brought about the famous O. P. (old price) riots, which lasted sixty one days and resulted in a general reduction. On June 29, 1817, John Kemble was followed by Charles Kemble. In 1822 the theater was thrown into chancery. In 1847 it commenced a new career as "The Royal Italian Opera House," but on March 14, 1856, it was burned down. It was rebuilt and the present house opened May 15, 1858.

Coventry (kuv'en-tri). A city in Warwickshire, England, 17 miles southeast of Birmingham. It has manufactures of bicycles, tricycles, watches, and ribbons, and was formerly celebrated for its woolens ("Coventry true blues"). Its chief buildings are the churches of St. Michael, the Trinity, and St. John, Christchurch, and St. Mary's Guildhall. According to legend it obtained its municipal rights from Leofric about 1044 by the ride of Godiva. (See Godiva.) It was formerly celebrated for the Coventry mystery plays. Population (1901), 52,752.

Coventry, John. Pseudonym of John William-son Palmer.

Coventry Plays. A series of forty-two religious plays acted at Coventry from an early date till about 1591. The first mention of them is in 1416. These plays were some of them written in 1468, but the title is thought to be of later date. This title terms the plays "Ludus Coventriæ s. Ludus Corpus Christi," and Corpus Christi plays were performed at Coventry in the 15th and 16th centuries. Clerical authorship is suspected in many of them, from the style of writing employed. (Ward.) They are far more regular in form than the Chester plays (doubtless written for tradesmen) by Undermore, and their versification and diction much better. They are to be classed among the mysteries, although they contain one element of the moralities.

Sir William Dugdale, in his "History of Warwickshire," printed in 1656, speaks of the Coventry plays as "being acted with mighty state and reverence by the friars of this house, who had theatres for the several scenes, very large and high, placed upon wheels, which were drawn to eminent parts of the city," and he referred to the Cotton MS. for authority as to the nature of their plays. The series known as the "Coventry Mysteries" may possibly have belonged to the Coventry Grey Friars, and the Grey Friars may have acted in the streets one set of Mysteries, the Guilds another, though the practical difficulties in the way of believing that there were ever two sets are great. Certain it is that the plays now called "Coventry Mysteries" are not those which were acted by the Guilds of Coventry.

Morley, English Writers, V. 114.

Coverdale (kuv'er-dāl), Miles. Born in the North Riding of Yorkshire in 1488: died in Feb., 1568. The first translator of the whole Bible into English. He studied at Cambridge, was ordained priest in 1514 at Norwich, and joined the Austin friars at Cambridge. About 1526 he assumed the habit of a secular priest, and, leaving the convent, devoted himself to evangelical preaching. In 1531 he took his degree as bachelor of canon law at Cambridge. He was probably on the Continent the greater part of the time until 1535, in this year his translation of the Bible appeared with a dedication to Henry VIII. (See Bible.) In 1538 he was sent by Cromwell to Paris to superintend a new English edition of the Bible. This was known as the "Great Bible." A second "Great Bible," known as "Cranmer's Bible" (1540), was also edited by him. He returned from Paris in 1539, but in 1540, on the execution of Cromwell, he was obliged to leave England, and shortly after married Elizabeth Macheson. This repudiation of the celibacy of the priesthood identified him with the Reformers. He lived at Tubingen for a short time, and was made doctor of divinity. From 1543 to 1547 he lived at Bergzabern (Deux-Ponts) as Lutheran minister and schoolmaster. In 1548 he returned to England, and was appointed chaplain to the king through Cranmer's influence. In 1551 he was appointed bishop of Exeter, of which office he was deprived in 1553 and went again to Bergzabern. It has been said that he assisted in preparing the Geneva Bible. In 1559 we find him again in England. In 1563 he received from Cambridge the degree of doctor of divinity, and obtained the living of Magnus, near London Bridge. In 1566 he resigned this office on account of his objection to the enforced strict observance of the liturgy. He continued preaching, however, and was followed by crowds.

Coverdale, Miles. The relater of events in Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance": a character which has many points of intellectual affinity with Hawthorne himself.

Coverley (kuv'er-li), Sir Roger de. The chief character in the club professing to write the "Spectator": an English country gentleman. He was sketched by Steele and developed by Addison.

Sir Roger de Coverley is not to be described by any pen but that of Addison. He exhibits, joined to a perfect simplicity, the qualities of a just, wise, useful man, and delightful companion. . . . Addison dwelt with tenderness on every detail regarding him, and finally described Sir Roger's death to prevent any less reverential pen from trifling with his hero.

Tuckerman, Hist. of Prose Fiction, p. 182.

Cowell, John. Born at Ernsborough, Devonshire, England, 1554: died at Cambridge, England, Oct. 11, 1611. An English jurist. He was regius professor of civil law at Cambridge 1594–1611, master of Trinity Hall in 1598, and vice-chancellor of the university in 1603 and 1604. He was the author of a legal dictionary entitled "The Interpreter, a booke containing the signification of words . . . mentioned in the Lawe-writers or statutes, etc." (1607). Certain passages in the book offended both the Commons and the king; the author was summoned before the council in 1610, and his dictionary was called in by common hangman.

Under the heading "King" Cowell wrote: "He is above the law by his absolute power, and though for the better and equal course in making laws, he do admit the Three Estates into Council, yet this is but in divers learned men's opinions is not of constraint, but of his own benignity, or by reason of the promise made upon oath at the time of his coronation."

Cowper, William. Born at Great Berkhampstead, Hertfordshire, Nov. 15, 1731: died at East Dereham, Norfolk, April 25, 1800. A celebrated English poet, son of John Cowper, D. D., rector of Great Berkhampstead. He was educated at Westminster School, where he remained from his tenth to his eighteenth year, was entered at the Middle Temple in April, 1748, and was called to the bar in June, 1754. In 1759 he was appointed a commissioner of bankrupts. He early showed symptoms of melancholia, and in 1763 anxiety with regard to his fitness for an office to which he had been offered him brought on an attack of suicidal mania which necessitated a temporary confinement in a private asylum at St. Albans. In June, 1765, he removed to Huntingdon, remaining there, in the family of the Rev. Morley Unwin, until 1767, when Unwin having died, he removed with Mrs. Unwin to Olney in Buckinghamshire, where he lived until Nov., 1786, removing then to Weston, a neighboring village. He was subject to repeated attacks of mental disease, which showed itself, as at first, in a tendency to religious and religious melancholy, and in his later years became a permanent condition of insanity. He published "Anti-Thelyphthora, a reply to a defense of polygamy" (by Madan) (1781), "Poems" (1782), "The Task," with "Tirocinium," of "John Gilpin," and an "Epistle to Joseph Hill" (1785), "Homer's Iliad and Odyssey" (1791), "Cowper's Prose Piece Illustrated," a translation of six letters from Van Lier to John Newton (1792), "Poems" (1798), and sixty-seven of the "Olney Hymns" (1779). After his death appeared "Poems," chiefly from the French of Madame Guyon (1803), translations from the Latin and Italian poems of Milton (1808), an edition of Milton (1810), and some early poems (1825).

Cox, Dickss, David. [The surname Cox or Coxe is another spelling of Cocks, a patronymic (genitive) form of Cock.] Born near Birmingham, England, April 29, 1783: died at Harborne Heath, near Birmingham, June 9, 1859. Coxcox. See the extract.

The Noah of the Mexican tribes was Coxcox, who, with his wife Xochiquetzal, alone escaped the deluge. They took refuge in the hollow trunk of a cypress (ahuehuete), which floated upon the waters for forty days, until the top of a mountain of Culhuacan. They had many children, but all of them were dumb. The Great Spirit took pity on them, and sent a dove, who hastened to teach them to speak. Fifteen of the children succeeded in grasping the power of speech, and from these the Toltecs and Aztecs are descended.

Crane (krān), Ichabod. A country schoolmaster in Irving's "Legend of Sleepy Hollow." He is the lover of Caterina Van Tassel, and is frightened out of the country one night by one of his rival by his adventure with the latter disguised as the Headless Horseman. "The cognomen of Crane was not inapplicable to his person. He was tall, but exceedingly lank, with narrow shoulders, long arms and legs, hands that dangled a mile out of his sleeves, feet that might have served for shovels, and his whole frame most loosely hung together. His head was small, and flat at top, with huge ears, large green glassy eyes, and a large snipe nose, so that it looked like a weathercock, perched upon his spindle neck to catch which way the wind blew. To see him striding along the profile of a hill on a windy day, with his clothes bagging and fluttering about him, one might have mistaken him for the genius of famine descending upon the earth, or some scarecrow eloped from a corn-field." Washington Irving, The Sketch-Book (Sleepy Hollow).

Crane, Walter. Born at Liverpool, 1845. An English genre-painter, best known by his illustrations for children's books, fairy tales, etc.

Cranmer (kran'mėr), Thomas. Born at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, July 2, 1489: died at Oxford, March 21, 1556. Archbishop of Canterbury. He was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of B. A. in 1512 and that of M. A. in 1515. In 1529 he obtained the favor of Henry VIII. by advising that in order to avoid the necessity of an appeal to Rome, the question of the king's marriage with Catharine of Aragon should be referred to the universities. He was appointed chaplain to the king, and in 1530 was sent as one of a party of Wiltshire on a mission to the Pope in reference to the divorce. In 1532 he was sent on a mission to the emperor in Germany, and in the same year influenced the rule of the Roman Catholic Church by marrying a niece of Osiander. He was appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1533, and in the same year pronounced the marriage of Henry with Catharine of Aragon invalid. He abjured his allegiance to Rome in 1535, became a member of the regency for Edward VI. in 1547, and in 1548 was head of the commission which composed the first English prayer-book. He invited a number of distinguished foreign Protestants to settle in England, including Peter Martyr, Ochino, Bucer, and Alasco or à Lasco. He refused to sign Edward's in 1553 to sign the patent which settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey to the exclusion of Mary and Elizabeth, and was in consequence committed to the Tower for treason on the accession of Mary. He was subsequently tried for heresy, and in spite of numerous recantations (which he repudiated at his execution) was sentenced to the stake.

Crannon, or Cranon (kran'on). [Gr. Κρανών, Κρανών.] In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, about 10 miles southwest of Larissa (exact site not known). Here, 322 B. C., Antipater defeated the confederated Greeks.

Cranon (called also Ephyra) was a city in the part of Thessaly known as Pelasgiotis (Hecat. Fr. 112; Steph. Byz. sd voc.). It stood in a fertile plain, remarkable alike for its cereal crops (Liv. xlii. 64, 65) and for its pasturage (Theocr. xvi. 38). Its exact site cannot well be fixed; but the plain in which it stood is undoubtedly that which lies south of the low ridge between Larissa and Fersala (Pharsalia), watered by the Enipeus, or Apidanus (Fersalit).

Crawley (krä'li). The name of a well-known family in Thackeray's novel "Vanity Fair." Sir Pitt Crawley, the head of the family, is a rich but sordid old man, fond of low society: to his house Becky Sharp goes as governess. She makes herself so attractive that he offers to marry her, when she is obliged to acknowledge her secret marriage with Rawdon Crawley, his youngest son. The latter is a blackleg and a gambler, but is fond of his wife and has a certain sort of his own. Mr. Pitt Crawley is a prig with "hair colored whisker- and straw-colored hair." He was called Miss Crawley at Eton, where his younger brother Rawdon used to lick him violently. The second Lady Crawley, a polite and apathetic woman, is a cadet to her step-daughter-in-law, the little eager, active black-eyed Miss Lætitia Crawley. The Rev. Bute Crawley is a "tall, stately, jolly, shovel-hatted man," a hen-pecking parson, whose wife writes his sermons for him. Miss Crawley, the sister of Sir Pitt and the Rev. Bute, is a kind and selfish, worldly and generous old woman, "who had a balance at her banker's which would have made her beloved anywhere."

Crayer (krī'yėr), Gaspar de. Born at Antwerp, Nov. 18, 1584: died at Ghent, Jan. 27, 1669. A Flemish painter. His best-known works are "St. Catharine" in Ghent, and Madonnas in Munich, Vienna, etc.

Crédit Mobilier (kred'it mō-bē'lier; F. pron. krā-dē' mo-bē-lyā'). [F., lit. 'personal credit': crédit, credit; mobilier, personal (of property), from mobile, movable.] 1. In French history, a banking corporation formed in 1852, under the name of the "Société Générale du Crédit Mobilier," with a capital of 60,000,000 francs, for the placing of loans, handling the stocks of all other companies, and the transaction of a general banking business. It engaged in very extensive transactions, buying, selling, and loaning in such a manner as to bring into one organized whole all the stocks and credit of France, and was apparently in a most prosperous condition until it proposed to issue bonds to the amount of 240,000,000 francs. This amount of paper currency frightened financiers, and the government forbade its issue. From this time the company rapidly declined, and closed its affairs in 1867, with great loss to all but its proprietors.

2. In United States history, a similar corporation chartered in Pennsylvania in 1863 with a capital of $2,500,000. In 1867, after passing into new hands, and increasing its stock to $3,750,000, it became a new company for the building of the Union Pacific Railroad.

For a few years it paid large dividends, and its stock rose in value. In a trial in Pennsylvania in 1872 as to the ownership of some stock, it was shown that certain Congressmen secretly possessed stock, and both houses of the Congress that met in December of that year appointed committees of investigation. The Senate committee recommended the expulsion of one member, but the Senate did nothing. The House committee recommended the expulsion of two of its members, but the House, instead, passed resolutions of censure.

Credulous (kred'ŭ-lus), Justice, and Mrs. Bridget (brij'et). An ignorant, good-natured pair in Sheridan's farce "St. Patrick's Day." They are fooled by the scheming lieutenant who marries their daughter Lauretta. Mrs. Bridget is a kind of Mrs. Malaprop. She speaks of a soldier "like a colossus, with one leg at New York and the other at Chelsea Hospital" (St. Patrick's Day, 2).

Cree (krē), or Cristineaux, or Knistineaux. An important tribe of North American Indians, who live principally in Manitoba and Assiniboia, between Red River and Lake Winnipeg on the east, and Saskatchewan River on the west. When first known they dwelt about Rainy Lake and Lake Winnipeg. They are divided into "Plain Trees, living about the portrecd the Saskatchewan; and "Wood Crees," dwelling in the forests of the Athapascan region. The name is derived from a word meaning "killers." They now number about 1,700. See Algonquian.

Creek, or Kreek (krēk). [Pl., also Creeks.] A powerful confederacy of North American Indians which in historic times occupied the greater part of Alabama and Georgia. The confederacy seems to have existed in 1540, and to have then embraced at least the following named tribes: Abika (or Coosa), Okfuski, Kasihta, and Kawita; afterward the Alabama, Hitchiti, Koasati, Natchez, Yuchi, and Yamasi. During the 18th century the only important conflict between the settlers and these tribes was with the Yamasi, which was instigated by the Spaniards; but the Creek war in 1813–14 was serious, and resulted in the cession to the United States of the greater part of the Creek land. Between 1825 and 1838 occurred the Seminole war, which was very costly in life and money to the United States government. The Creek "Nation" now holds lands in Indian Territory, and is well organized. The population, which contains many white blood, is 13,000. Also called Muskoki, Muskoki, Muscogee, Mobilian. See Muskhogean.

Crefeld, or Krefeld (krā'feld). A city in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 12 miles northwest of Düsseldorf. It has a royal textile academy, is the chief seat of the velvet and silk manufacture of Germany, and exports its fabrics largely to Great Britain, the United States, etc. It was acquired by Prussia from the house of Nassau in 1702. On June 23, 1758, Ferdinand of Brunswick defeated the French under the Count of Clermont. Population (1890), commune, 106,376.

Cremona (krē-mō'nä; It. pron. krā-mō'nä). 1. A province of Lombardy, Italy, bordering on the Po. It has manufactures of silk. Area, 686 square miles. Population (1881), 302,138. — 2. The capital of the above province, situated on the Po in lat. 45° 8′ N., long. 10° 1′ E. It contains a cathedral (see below), the Palazzo Pubblico, and the Torrazzo, the highest tower in northern Italy (396 feet). It has important silk manufactures, and has long been celebrated for the manufacture of violins and violas, in which the Amati family, Stradivarius, and others, from the 16th to the 18th century, achieved reputation. In the 16th century it had a school of art. It is an ancient Gallic town; was colonized by the Romans about 219 B. C.; was destroyed by Vespasian's troops 69 A. D.; and suffered in the middle ages. The cathedral was begun in 1107. The front, in alternate courses of red and white marble, has a fine doorway, with columns resting on lions; the north transept has a similar porch. The interior is rich in good frescos. The Lombard baptistery is octagonal, with arcaded interior and an octagonal font of red marble. Population (1891), commune, 35,000.

Crescentini (krā-shen-tē'nē), Girolamo. Born at Urbania, near Urbino, Italy, 1769: died at Naples, April 24, 1846. A celebrated Italian singer (mezzo-soprano) and composer, professor at the Royal College of Music at Naples from 1813.

Crescentius (kres-sen'shius), or Cencius (sen'shius). Died 998. A leader of the popular faction at Rome. Having obtained the dignity of consul 980, he usurped the government, and announced his intention of restoring the ancient republic. He opposed Pope Gregory V., who was driven from Rome by the influence of the emperor Otto III., and, supported by the Byzantine court, put forward John XVI. as antipope. He was defeated by Otto at St. Angelo, April 23, 998, and put to death. According to the legend Crescentius was revenged by his widow Stephania or Theodora, who, having succeeded in gaining the confidence and the love of the emperor, put him to death by poison.

There he (the emperor) put the rebel Crescentius, in whom modern enthusiasm has seen a patriotic republican who, reviving the institutions of Alberic, had ruled as consul or senator, sometimes even as himself Emperor.
Bryce, Holy Roman Empire.

Crescenzi (krā-shen'dzē), Pietro. Born at Bologna, Italy, 1230: died at Bologna, 1307 (?). An Italian writer on agriculture, author of "Opus ruralium commodorum" (1471), one of the first of printed books, etc.

Crespy (krā-pē'). See Crépy-en-Laonnais.

Cressid (kres'id), or Cressida (kres'i-dä). The mythical daughter of a Trojan priest Calchas, whose infidelities make her name a byword for faithlessness. See Troilus and Cressida.

As far as can be made out, the invention of Cressid (called by him, and for some time afterwards, Briseïda, and so identified with Homer's Briseïs) belongs to Benoist de Ste. More, a trouvère of the twelfth century, who wrote a Roman de Troie of great length, as well as a verse chronicle of Normandy. The story is told by Benoist in no small detail, and the character of Briseïda (which Dryden has entirely spoilt by making her faithful) is well indicated. After Benoist, Guido delle Colonne reproduced the story in a very popular Latin work, the Historia Trojana. Cressid is here still briseïda, or rather Briseïs. From Guido the story passed to Boccaccio, who seems himself to be responsible for the character of Pandarus, and from Boccaccio to Chaucer. "Lollius," alluded to by Chaucer, is believed to be a misnomer.
Saintsbury, note in Dryden's Troilus and Cressida (Scott's [ed., revised 1884).

Cressid, or Creseide, Testament of, and its continuation The Complaint of Creseide. Poems by Robert Henryson, attributed by Stowe (1561) to Chaucer.

Crete (krēt), It. Candia (kan'di-ä): It. pron. kän'dē-ä). [Gr. Κρήτη, L. Creta, F. Candie; mod. Gr. Kriti, Turk. Kirid.] An island in the Mediterranean, situated southeast of Greece and southwest of Asia Minor. It forms a vilayet of the Turkish empire. Its surface is mostly mountainous, and it produces wheat, fruit, wool, and wine. The chief towns are Khania and Megalo Kastron. Its inhabitants are mainly Greek. Crete was connected with legends of Zeus and Minos, and was celebrated in antiquity for its laws. It was subdued by the Romans under Metellus 67 B. C. was occupied by the Saracens, and later was a part of the Byzantine empire. It was ceded to Venice in 1204. Its conquest by the Turks was completed in 1669. Its people took part in the Greek war of independence. The government was administered by Egypt from 1830 to 1840. The island has been the scene of many revolts. Length, 155 miles. Greatest width, 35 miles. Area, 2,949 square miles. Population, 294,192.

Crétin (krā-tan'), Guillaume. A French poet who lived in the reigns of Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I.

But the leader of the whole was Guillaume Crétin (birth and death dates uncertain), whom his contemporaries extolled in the most extravagant fashion, and whom a single satirical stroke of Rabelais has made a laughing-stock for some three hundred and fifty years. The rondeau ascribed to Mammigarbolis, the "vieux poëte français" of Pantagruel, is Crétin's, and the name and character have stuck. Crétin was not worse than his fellows; but when even such a man as Marot could call him a poëte souverain, Rabelais no doubt did well to protest in the way he did. Marot himself, it is to be observed, confines himself chiefly to citing Crétin's vers equivoques, which of their kind, and if we could do otherwise than pronounce that kind hopelessly bad, are without doubt ingenious. His poems are chiefly occasional verse, letters, debats, etc., besides ballades and rondeaux of all kinds.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 165.

Creusa (krē-ū'sä). In classical legend, the daughter of Priam, and wife of Æneas.

Crichton (krī'ton), James (styled "The Admirable Crichton"). Born in Scotland, Aug. 19, 1560: killed at Mantua, Italy, July 3 (?), 1585. A Scottish scholar and adventurer, celebrated for his extraordinary accomplishments, and attainments in the languages, sciences, and arts. At the age of seventeen he started upon his travels on the Continent. He was then the reputed master of twelve languages. He enlisted in the French army about 1577. In 1579 he resigned and went to Italy. Here many debates both public and private were arranged for him, in all of which he was victorious except with Mazzoni. He wrote Latin odes and verses with ease, and his skill as a swordsman was highly lauded. In 1581 he disputed with the professors of the university at Padua on their interpretation of Aristotle. A misadventure led to his being denounced as a charlatan, whereupon he challenged the university, offering to confute their Aristotelian interpretations and to expose their errors in mathematics. The disputation lasted four days, and Crichton was completely successful. He won his first laurels in Mantua by killing in a duel a far-famed swordsman. His death took place there in a midnight street attack. Crichton is said to have recognized the leader of the brawlers as his pupil, the son of the Duke of Mantua, and having drawn his sword upon him he was offered a bribe by the latter's uncle, whereupon the prince seized it and stabbed him to the heart. *Diet. Cricket on the Hearth, The. A tale by Charles Dickens, published in 1845. The singing-match between a tea-kettle and a cricket on a carrier's hearthstone in which the latter comes out ahead, gives its name to the book. "To have a cricket on the hearth is the luckiest thing in the world."

Crieff (krēf). A town in Perthshire, Scotland, 16 miles west of Perth. Population (1891), 4,901.

Crillon (krē-yōn'), Louis des Balbes de Berton de. Born at Murs, Provence, France, 1541: died at Avignon, France, Dec. 2, 1615. A celebrated French general, called "L'Homme sans peur" ("the fearless"). He fought against the Huguenots in the civil wars, taking part in the battles of Rouen, Dreux, St. Denis, Jarnac, Moncontour, and St. Jean d'Angely; served as a Knight of Malta under Don John of Austria at Lepanto in 1571; and held a high command in the army of Henry III. during the war of the League (1585–89). After the death of Henry III. he came to the service of Henry IV., under whom he fought at the battle of Ivry in 1590, and from whom he received the title of Brave Crillon.

Crillon-Mahon (krē-yōn'ma-ōn'), Louis des Balbes de Berton, Due de. Born 1718: died at Madrid, 1796. A French general. He served with distinction at Fontenoy 1745, and in the Seven Years' War. Later he passed into the Spanish service, conquered Minorca, 1782, and was made captain of the Spanish guards and duke of Mahon. His "Mémoires" were published in 1791.

Crimea (krī-mē'ä). [Russ. Krym or Krim, F. Crimée.] A peninsula in the government of Taurida, southern Russia, nearly surrounded by the Black Sea and Sea of Azov: the ancient Taurica Chersonesus. In the northern portion its surface is a plain, but south of the river Salghir it is mountainous. Its inhabitants are principally Russians and Tatars. Capital, Sevastopol. In ancient inhabitants were the Cimmerians, afterward called Taurians. It was the seat of the kingdom of Bosporus (which see), and was frequently overrun in the middle ages. It became a dependency of Turkey in 1475, was annexed to Russia in 1783, and in 1853–56 was the scene of the Crimean war (which see). Area, 9,960 square miles.

Crime and Punishment. A novel by Dostoievsky, published in 1866.

Crimean War. A war waged 1853–56 between Russia and the allied forces of Turkey, France, Great Britain, and Sardinia. It arose through the strife in regard to the "Holy Places" in Palestine, and was fought out by rivalry between Great Britain and Russia. Its leading events were: battle of Sinope 1853; Russian occupation of the Danubian principalities 1854; battle of the Alma, Sept. 20, 1854; beginning of the siege of Sebastopol Oct., 1854; battle of Balaklava Oct. 25; battle of Inkerman Nov. 5; attacks on Sebastopol June, 1855; battle of Tchernaya Aug. 16; storming the Malakoff Sept. 8, and of Sebastopol Sept. 11, and the capture of Kars by the Russians Nov. 28, 1855. The war was closed, and its issues decided, by the treaty of Paris (which see), March 30, 1856.

Crimisus (kri-mī'sus), or Crimissus (kri-mis'us). In ancient geography, a river in western Sicily, probably near Segesta. Here, 339 B. C., Timoleon with 11,000 men defeated 70,000 Carthaginians.

Crimmitschau, or Crimmitzschau (krim'mitshou). A manufacturing town in Saxony, situated on the Pleisse 36 miles south of Leipsic. Its leading industries are spinning and weaving. Population (1890), 19,972.

Crinan (krē'nan) Canal. A canal through the peninsula of Argyllshire, Scotland, connecting Loch Fyne with the ocean. Length, 9 miles.

Cringle, Tom. See Tom Cringle's Log.

Cringle (kring'gl), Tom. The pseudonym of William Walker, in his writings on Australia and India.

Cripplegate (krip'l-gāt), or Crepel-gate. An old London gate. It was the fourth from the western end of the wall. The original gate was probably built by King Alfred when he rebuilt the walls, 886 A.D. Stow says that in 1010, when the body of Edmund the Martyr, king of the East Angles, was borne through this gate, many lame people who were congregated there to beg rose upright and were cured by its miraculous influence. The postern was afterward a prison for debtors and common trespassers. It was rebuilt in 1491, and in the fifteenth year of Charles II. it was repaired and a footpostern made. The rooms over the gate were used by the city water-bailiff. Cripplegate was pulled down in 1760.

Crish Kringle. See Kriss Kringle.

Crisp (krisp), Charles Frederick. Born at Sheffield, England, Jan. 29, 1845. An American politician. He served as a lieutenant in the Confederate army in the Civil War; was admitted to the bar in 1866; was appointed solicitor-general of the southwestern judicial district in 1872; was reappointed for a term of four years in 1873; was appointed judge of the Superior Court of the same district in 1877; was elected by the general assembly to the same office in 1878; was reelected judge for a term of four years in 1880; resigned in 1882; was a Democratic representative from Georgia from the Forty-eighth through the Fifty-third Congresses; and was speaker of the House in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses.

Crispi (kris'pē), Francesco. Born at Ribera, Sicily, Oct. 4, 1819. An Italian statesman. He studied law at the University of Palermo, and in 1846 settled at Naples. He served as a major under Garibaldi at Calatafimi in 1860, was returned to Palermo to the first Italian Parliament in 1861; became president of the Chamber of Deputies in 1876; was minister of the interior 1877–78; and was prime minister 1887–91, and again in 1893.

Crispin (kris'pin), Saint. [L. Crispinus, Crispianus, having curly hair; F. Crespin, Crepin, It. Crispino, Crispo, Sp. Crispo.] A Christian martyr, a member of a noble Roman family, who with his brother Crispinianus fled to Soissons and took up the trade of a shoemaker. He is said to have been so desirous of helping the poor that he stole leather to make shoes for them. He was put to death about 287 by being thrown into a caldron of melted lead. He is the patron saint of shoemakers. His day in the Roman and Anglican churches is Oct. 25.

Crispin (kris'pin; F. pron. krēs-paṅ). An impudent, boasting, and witty valet, a ready assistant in the love-affairs of his master: a conventional character in French comedy, introduced apparently from the Italian comedy by Poirson about 1654. It Poirson was not creator of the character, he played it remarkably, and his costume has come down to this time. Crispin was for a long time to French comedy what Harlequin was to Italian comedy.

Crispin, Gilbert. Died about 1117. An English scholar and prelate, abbot of Westminster. Two of his works have survived, "Vita Herlini," the chief authority for the early history of Bec, and "Disputatio Judæi cum Christiano," a dialogue between a Jew and the author.

Crispin, Rival de son Maître. A comedy by Le Sage, produced in 1707.

Crispinella (kris-pi-nel'lä). In Marston's play "The Dutch Courtezan," a sparkling, lively girl, the opposite of her sister Beatrice.

Little Crispinella (though even less choice in her language than Shakspere's Beatrice) is one of the most sparkling fictitious of Elizabethan comedy, and in adequate hands would prove a source of genuine delight to any audience. Ward.

Crispino e la Comare (krēs-pē'nō ā lä kō-mä're). [It., 'The Shoemaker and the Fairy Godmother.'] A comic opera by Luigi Ricci, first produced at Venice in 1850. Federico Ricci assisted his brother in its composition. The words are by Piave.

Crispinus (kris-pī'nus). In Ben Jonson's "Poetaster," a bad poet who gives its title to the play. He is intended for Marston, with whom Jonson had a quarrel at the time. "He is represented as a coarse-minded, ill-conditioned fellow, of the lowest extravagance, who, like the bore encountered by Horace in the Via Sacra, is prepared to adopt the meanest stratagems in order to gain admittance to the society of courtiers and wits." Ballou.

Crispus (kris'pus). Flavius Julius. Died 326 A. D. Eldest son of Constantine the Great and Minervina. He was made Cæsar in 317, and consul in 318. Having distinguished himself in a campaign against the Franks and in the war against Licinius, over whom he gained a great naval victory in the Hellespont in 323, he excited the jealousy of his stepmother Fausta, and at her instigation was put to death by order of his father.

Crissa (kris'ä), or Crisa (krī'sä), or Cirrha (sir'ä). [Gr. Κρισσα, Κρῖσα, Κῖρρα.] In ancient geography, a city of Phocis, Greece, situated southwest of Delphi. It was styled by Homer "the divine." It is often confounded with its port, Cirrha.

Criss Kingle (kris' king'gl). [Also Kriss Kringle, Kriss Kringle; corrupt forms of Christkindel (cf. criss-cross for Christ-cross), from the G. "Christ-Kindel or Christ-kindlein or Christkindelein, the little Christ-child, dim. of Christkind, the Christ-child.] The Christ-child.

Cristineaux (kres-tē-nō'). See Ores.

Cristinos (kres-tē'nos). In Spanish history, the partizans of Donna Maria Christina (Sp. Cristine), regent for her daughter Isabella Maria II. 1833–40. Ferdinand VII., who married Christina in 1829, repealed the Salic law of succession, introduced by Philip V. 1713, in accordance with which females could inherit the throne only in case of the total extinction of the male line; and by a decree of March, 1830, called the pragmatic sanction, established the old Castilian law in accordance with which the daughters and grandchildren of the king take precedence of his brothers and nephews. The pragmatic sanction was not recognized by the king's brother, Don Carlos, who supported the reactionists or absolutists, began a civil war on the death of Ferdinand, 1833. See Carlists.

Crites (krī'tēz). [Gr. κριτής, a judge.] A man of "straight judgment and a strong mind," in Jonson's play "Cynthia's Revels."

Throughout the quarto he is called Criticus. By Crites here (Gifford, folio), as well as by Asper in "Every Man out of his Humour," and Horace in the "Poetaster," Jonson undoubtedly meant to shadow forth himself. This sacrifice to vanity, as it involved him in personalities, naturally increased the number of his enemies, and exaggerated the hostility with which he was long pursued. Gifford. Note to Jonson's Cynthia's Revels.

Critias (krit'i-as). [Gr. Κριτίας.] An Athenian orator and politician, a pupil of Socrates, and one of the thirty tyrants (404 B. C.): noted for his dissolute life, rapacity, and cruelty. He perished in the battle of Munychia. Plato introduces him in a dialogue (a fragment) which bears his name.

Critic (krit'ik), The. A farce by Richard Brinsley Sheridan, produced Oct. 30, 1779. It is an imitation of Buckingham's "Rehearsal."

Criticon (krit'i-kon). See the extract.

> The most remarkable work of Gracian, however, is his "Criticon," published in three parts, between 1650 and 1653. It is an allegory on human life, and gives us the adventures of Critilus, a noble Spaniard, wrecked on the desert island of Saint Helena, where he finds a solitary savage, who knows nothing about himself, except that he has been nursed by a wild beast. After much communication in dumb show, they are able to understand each other in Spanish, and, being taken from the island, travel together through the world, talking often of the leading men of their time in Spain, but holding intercourse more with allegorical personages than with one another. The story of their adventures is long, and its three portions represent the three periods of human life; the first being called the Spring of Childhood, the second the Autumn of Manhood, and the third the Winter of Old Age. In some parts it shows much talent; and eloquent discussions on moral subjects, and glowing descriptions of events and natural scenery, can occasionally be taken from it, which are little injured by the extravagances of the Cultivated Style. Sometimes we are reminded of the "Pilgrim's Progress," as, for instance, in the scenes of the World's Fair, and might almost say that the "Criticon" is to the Catholic religion and the notions of life in Spain during the reign of Philip the Fourth what Bunyan's fiction is to Puritanism and the English character in the age of Cromwell. Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 222.

Criticus. See Crites.

Critique de L'École des femmes (krē-tēk' dē la-kōl' dā fam). A brilliant short play by Molière, acted in 1663. It introduces contemporary society criticizing his "École des femmes."

Critique of Pure Reason. [G. Kritik der reinen Vernunft.] A famous philosophical work by Kant, published in 1781. A second and revised edition appeared in 1787; the last editions are reprints of this. The changes introduced in the second edition have been the occasion of much discussion among German philosophers, many maintaining that they show an essential alteration of Kant's doctrines. For himself, however, declared that they were made solely to secure greater clearness.

Crito (krī'tō). [Gr. Κρίτων.] Lived about 400 B. C. An Athenian, a friend and follower of Socrates. He is a prominent character in the dialogue by Plato named for him.

Critolaus (krit-ō-lā'us). [Gr. Κριτόλαος.] 1. Died 146 B. C. An Achæan demagogue, last strategus of the Achæan League, defeated by Metellus at Scarphea in 146.—2. A Greek Peripatetic philosopher of the 2d century B. C.

Crittenden (krit'n-den), George Bibb. Born at Russellville, Ky., March 20, 1812; died at Danville, Ky., Nov. 27, 1880. An American major-general, son of J. J. Crittenden. He served throughout the Mexican war. At the outbreak of the Civil War he joined the Confederate service with the rank of brigadier-general, and was shortly promoted major-general. He was placed in command of southwestern Kentucky and a part of eastern Tennessee in Nov., 1861. He was defeated by General Thomas at Mill Spring, Jan. 19, 1862.

Crittenden, John Jordan. Born in Woodford County, Ky., Sept. 10, 1787; died near Frankfort, Ky., July 26, 1863. An American politician. He graduated at William and Mary College in 1807, and was subsequently admitted to the bar. He served in the War of 1812; was a member of the State House of Representatives in 1816; was United States senator (Whig) from Kentucky 1835-41; was attorney-general under President Harrison, March 5-Sept. 13, 1841; was United States senator 1842-48; was governor of Kentucky 1848-50; was attorney-general under President Fillmore 1850-53; was United States senator 1855-61; and was member of Congress (Unionist) 1861-63.

Crittenden, Thomas Leonidas. Born at Russellville, Ky., May, 1819; died at Annandale, Staten Island, N. Y., Oct., 1893. An American general, son of J. J. Crittenden. He served in the Mexican war; became brigadier-general of volunteers in the Union army Oct. 27, 1861; commanded a division at the battle of Shiloh April 6 and 7, 1862; was promoted major-general July 17, 1862; commanded a corps at the battles of Stone River Dec. 31, 1862–Jan. 3, 1863, and Chickamauga Sept. 19–20, 1863; and was brevetted brigadier-general March 2, 1867.

Crittenden Compromise. A measure urged in the United States Senate by John J. Crittenden 1860–61, providing for the re-establishment of the slave-line of 36° 30′ N., and for the enforcing of the fugitive-slave laws.

Croagh Patrick (krō'ach pat'rik), or Reek. A mountain near Westport, County Mayo, Ireland, noted in the story of St. Patrick.

Croaker (krō'kėr), Mr. and Mrs. A strongly contrasted pair in Goldsmith's "The Good-Natured Man." He is gifted in saying sadly the most cutting things: she is both merry and spiteful.

Croaker and Co. The pseudonym under which Joseph Rodman Drake and Fitz-Greene Halleck wrote the "Croaker Pieces" in the New York "Evening Post," 1819.

Croatia (krō-ā'shiā). [F. Croatie, G. Kroatien, Russ. Kroatsiya, etc.; from Croat, F. Croate, G. Kroate.] A titular kingdom in Austria-Hungary, which with Slavonia forms a separate division in the Hungarian part of the monarchy. It is bounded by Carniola, Styria, and Hungary (separated by the Drave) on the north, by Slavonia and Bosnia on the east, by Bosnia and Dalmatia on the south, and by the Adriatic, Fiume, and Carniola on the west. It is traversed by the Save and by prolongations of the Alps. Its soil is productive. Capital, Agram. The inhabitants are principally Croats. Croatia belonged in great part to the Roman province of Pannonia. It was overrun by the East Goths; was conquered by Charlemagne; was overrun by the Avars; and was settled by the Croats in the 7th century. The land was at first called Chrobatia. It passed under the rule of Charlemagne, and soon after acknowledged the authority of the Byzantine emperor. The kingdom of Croatia was established in the 10th century, and the king of Croatia took also the title of king of Dalmatia in 1062. Croatia was annexed to Hungary in 1091. After various vicissitudes it came under the immediate supremacy of Hungary in 1309, and thereafter followed the fortunes of that country. (See Croatia and Slavonia, below.)

Croatia, Burkish. The northwestern division of Bosnia (which see).

Croatia and Slavonia (sla-vō'ni-ā). A land of the Hungarian division of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. It comprises Croatia and Slavonia, and in it is incorporated the chief part of the former military frontier. Capital, Agram. Its inhabitants are chiefly Slavs of the Serbo-Croatian race. Their religion is Roman Catholic and Greek Catholic. It sends 3 delegates to the upper house and 40 delegates to the lower house of the Hungarian Reichstag, and has a Diet (Landtag) of 90 members. It was separated from Hungary and made a crownland in 1849, but was reunited to Hungary in 1868. Area, 16,772 square miles. Population (1890), 2,200,177.

Croats (krō'atz). [See Croatia.] The Slavonic race which inhabits Croatia, and from which it takes its name.

Crockett (krok'et), David. Born at Limestone, Tenn., Aug. 17, 1786: killed at Fort Alamo, San Antonio de Bexar, Texas, March 6, 1836. An American pioneer, hunter, and politician. He was member of Congress from Tennessee 1827–31, and from the Texas district 1833–35. He published his autobiography in 1834. He was a fine shot and an eccentric humorist, and the story is told of his having treed a coon which, when he recognized Crockett, called out to him: "Don't shoot, colonel; I'll come down." "Then I'm a gone coon." This story was originally told of a captain Scott who was a famous shot (Scheele de Vere). Often in the dictionary-stage that phrase originated in the fact that "in the American war" a spy dressed in racoon-skins took refuge in a tree and addressed the English foeman in the same terms.

Crockford's (krok'fōrdz). A famous gaming club-house at No. 50 on the west side of St. James street, London, opposite White's. It was built by William Crockford, originally a fishmonger, in 1827. He is said to have made a large fortune by gambling. He died May 24, 1844, but the house was reopened in 1849 for the Military, Naval, and Country Service Club. It was closed again in 1851. It was for several years a theatre, the house, "The Wellington," and is now the Devonshire Club.

Crocodile (krok'ō-dīl). Lady Kitty. In Foote's "Trip to Calais," a hypocritical, intriguing woman of quality, intended to satirize the notorious Duchess of Kingston, whose trial for bigamy was just coming on. The influence of the audience was sufficient to stop the production of the play. See Trip to Calais.

Crocodilopolis (krok'ō-di-lop'ō-lis). [Gr. Κροκοδείλων πόλις, city of crocodiles.] 1. Arsinoë.—2. Athribis, in ancient Egypt.

Cræsus (krē'sus). [Gr. Κροῖσος.] A king of Lydia, son of Alyattes whom he succeeded in 560 B. C. He subjugated the Ionian, Æolian, and other neighboring peoples, and at the close of his reign ruled over the region extending from the northern and western coasts of Asia Minor to the Ægean on the east and the Taurus on the south. According to Herodotus, he was visited at the height of his power by Solon, to whom he exhibited his innumerable treasures, and who, when pressed to acknowledge him the happiest of mortals, answered, "Account no man happy before his death." Deceived by a response of the oracle at Delphi to the effect that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, he made war in 546 upon Cyrus, by whom he was defeated in the same year near Sardis and taken prisoner. He was, according to Herodotus, doomed to be burned alive, but as he stood upon the pyre he recalled the words of Solon, and exclaimed "Solon! Solon!" Desired by Cyrus to state upon whom he was calling, he related the story of Solon, which moved Cyrus to countermand the order for his execution, and to bestow upon him distinguished marks of favor.

Croft (krōft), Herbert. Born at Great Thame, Oxfordshire, Oct. 18, 1603: died at Hereford, May 18, 1691. Bishop of Hereford. He was originally intended for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but eventually took holy orders in the Church of England, having obtained the degree of B. D. at Oxford in 1636. He became chaplain to Charles I. about 1640, canon of Windsor in 1641, and dean of Hereford in 1644; was deprived of his preferments during the Rebellion (which were restored to him on the accession of Charles II.), became bishop of Hereford in 1662, and was dean of the Chapel Royal 1668–70. His chief work is "The Naked Truth, or the True State of the Primitive Church" (1675).

Cromwell, Henry. Born at Huntingdon, England, Jan. 20, 1628: died at Soham, Cambridgeshire, England, March 23, 1674. A younger son of Oliver Cromwell, lord deputy in Ireland 1655–1657, and lord lieutenant 1657–59.

Cromwell, Oliver. Born at Huntingdon, England, April 25, 1599: died at Whitehall, London, Sept. 3, 1658. Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. He studied at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, 1616–17, was elected member of Parliament for Huntingdon in 1628, and for the second battle of Newbury Oct. 27, 1644; was promoted to lieutenant-colonel on the reorganization (after plans furnished by him) of the army in April, 1645; commanded the right wing of the Parliamentary army at Naseby June 14, 1645, and took Basing House Oct. 16, 1645. On the rupture in 1647 between the army, which was controlled by the Independents, and Parliament, which was controlled by the Presbyterians, he sided with the army, and supported the measures by which the Independents obtained control of Parliament. He suppressed an insurrection in Wales in 1648, defeated the Scotch royalists at Prestonpans Aug. 17–20, 1648, and, as a member of the High Court, signed the death-warrant of Charles I. on Jan. 29, 1649. The establishment of the Commonwealth in 1649 he obtained, by virtue of his position as leader of the Independents and ruling spirit in the army, the actual control of the government. He undertook an expedition into Ireland Aug. 15, 1649; stormed Drogheda Sept. 12, 1649; was appointed captain-general and commander-in-chief of all the forces of the Commonwealth Aug. 31, 1650; defeated the Scotch royalists at Dunbar Sept. 3, 1650, and at Worcester Sept. 3, 1651; expelled the Rump Parliament April 20, 1653; and was appointed by the army Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. His protectorate was marked by religious toleration, by advantageous commercial treaties with foreign nations, and by successful wars with the Dutch (1652–54), the dey of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli (1655), and the Spaniards (1656–59). See Carlyle's "Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell," and "Life of Cromwell," and Guizot's works on English history.

Cromwell, Richard. Born at Huntingdon, England, Oct. 4, 1626: died at Cheshunt, near London, July 12, 1712. Son of Oliver Cromwell, whom he succeeded as Lord Protector Sept., 1658. He resigned May, 1659.

Cromwell, Thomas, Earl of Essex. Born probably about 1485: died at London, July 28, 1540. An English statesman, the son of a blacksmith. He served in his youth in the French army in Italy, and after his return to England became a lawyer. He was appointed collector of the revenues of the see of York by Wolsey in 1514; became a member of Parliament in 1523; was appointed privy councilor by Henry VIII. in 1531; and was made chancellor of the exchequer in 1533. In 1535 he was appointed vicar-general of the king to carry into effect the Act of Supremacy, in which capacity he began in 1536 the suppression of the monasteries and the confiscation of their property. He became lord privy seal in 1536, and lord high chamberlain of England in 1539, and was created earl of Essex in 1540. In 1539 he negotiated the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne of Cleves, which took place in Jan., 1540. Having fallen under the king's displeasure, partly on account of his advocacy of religious reform, he was attacked by Parliament and beheaded on the charge of treason.

Crucifixion, The. Of the paintings of this subject the following are among the most notable: (a) A large painting by Lucas Cranach in the Stadtkirche at Weimar, Germany. It contains portraits of the artist and of Luther and Melanchthon on the right, and on the left Christ overcomes Satan in the form of a Protean monster. (b) A small painting by Albert Durer (1509), in the museum at Dresden. (c) An impressive painting by Mantegna, in the Louvre, Paris. Christ is between the two thieves; St. John and the holy women wait in grief on the left, and a body of soldiers cast lots for the garment on the right. This picture is part of the predella of the altarpiece of San Zenone, Verona; two other parts are in the Musée at Tours. (d) A noted painting by Van Dyck, in St. Michael's, at Ghent, Belgium. A mounted soldier holds out the sponge to Christ with his spear; St. John and the Marys are grouped below, and angels appear above. (e) A painting called "Le coupde lance," by Rubens, in the museum at Antwerp, Belgium. The time is evening: the three crosses stand side by side on Mount Calvary. Christ is already dead, and a mounted soldier is piercing his side with a spear. The three Marys and St. John are grouped at the foot of the cross. This is said to be the most carefully finished painting executed by Rubens. (f) A fresco of Perugino, in the chapter-house of Santa Maria Maddalena dei Pazzi, Florence. It is divided into three parts by architectural framework. In the central part, beneath the crucified Christ, are the two Marys; on the right are St. John and Bernard; on the left is an impressive figure of the Virgin, with St. Benedict. (g) A painting by Tintoret, in the Scuola di San Rocco, at Venice. It is this painter's masterpiece.

Cruciger (krōt'sig-er), or Creuziger (kroit'sig-er), or Creutzinger (kroit'sing-er), Kaspar. Born at Leipsic, Jan. 1, 1504: died at Wittenberg, Germany, Nov. 16, 1548. A German Protestant theologian, a co-worker with Luther in the translation of the Bible. He became a preacher at Wittenberg in 1528, and professor of philosophy (later of theology) in the university.

Cruden (krō'den), Alexander. Born at Aberdeen, Scotland, May 31, 1701: died at London, Nov. 1, 1770. A London bookseller, author of a famous "Concordance of the Holy Scriptures" (1737). He was eccentric to the verge of insanity. He believed that he had been specially appointed by God to correct the morals of the British nation, and accordingly assumed the title of "Alexander the Corrector" (probably suggested to him by his work as corrector of the press).

Crudor (krō'dōr), Sir. In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a knight who insists that Briana shall supply him with enough hair, consisting of ladies' curls and knights' beards, to purfle his cloak before he will marry her. Sir Calidore overthrows him, and her raid on the passers-by is stopped.

He began his career as an illustrator of children's books, and his satirical genius first found expression in "The Scourge," a publication issued between 1811–16. At this time his caricatures were in the style of Gillray, but about 1819 he began to illustrate books and developed a style of his own. His caricatures of Napoleon, of the impostures of Joanna Southcott, the corn-laws, the domestic infelicities of the regent and his wife, etc., are noted. In 1827 William Hone issued a collection of Cruikshank's caricatures, among which was the latter scandal, which he called "Facetiæ and Miscellanies." Some of his best illustrations were for Scott and for a translation of Grimm's tales. In 1823 he issued his designs for Chamisso's "Peter Schlemihl." His arrangement with Dickens began with "Sketches by Boz" in 1836. He designed for Richard Bentley (1837–43) Dickens's Ainsworth (1836–44). "The Bottle" (eight plates, 1847) and "The Drunkard's Children" (eight plates, 1848) were the first products of his satirical crusade against drunkenness. He continued to produce etchings, etc., in rapid and brilliant succession till his eighty-third year: three years after this he died. He wrote various pamphlets and squibs and sketches, many volumes of his own, and in his later years undertook to paint in oils. His most celebrated effort in this line is a large picture called "The Worship of Bacchus, or the Drinking Customs of Society" (1862). The painting is in the National Gallery.

Crupp (krup), Mrs. In Charles Dickens's "David Copperfield," David's landlady. She is afflicted with "spazzums."

Crusades, The. In medieval history, a number of expeditions undertaken by the Christians of Europe for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Mohammedans. The crusading spirit was aroused throughout Europe in 1095 by the preaching of the monk Peter the Hermit, who with Walter the Penniless set out in 1096 with an immense rabble, which was for the most part destroyed on the way. The first Crusade, properly so called, under Godfrey of Bouillon, 1096–99, resulted in the capture of Jerusalem and the establishment of a Christian kingdom in the Holy Land; the second, 1147, preached by St. Bernard, was unsuccessful; the third, 1189–92, led by the princes Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, Richard the Lion-hearted of England, and Philip Augustus of France, failed to recover Jerusalem, which the Mussulmans had taken in 1187; the fourth, 1202–04, ended in the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople, under Count Baldwin of Flanders; the fifth, 1228–1229, under the emperor Frederick II.; the sixth, 1248–50, under St. Louis (Louis IX. of France), and the seventh and last, 1270–71, also under St. Louis, were all unsuccessful. There were other expeditions called crusades, including, in 1212, "the children's crusade," in which many thousands perished by shipwreck or were enslaved.

Crusé (krū-sā'), Christian Frederic. Born at Philadelphia, 1794: died at New York, Oct. 5, 1865. An American Episcopalian clergyman and scholar. He translated Eusebius's "Ecclesiastical History" (1833).

She was successful in Vienna, and later in Paris and London. In 1854 she appeared at the Grand Opera in Paris, and won much applause in Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," which was written for her. In 1856 she married Baron Vigier, and left the stage.

Crux (kruks). [L., 'a cross.'] The Southern Cross, the most celebrated constellation of the southern heavens. It was erected into a constellation by Royer in 1679, but was often spoken of as a cross before; there even seems to be an obscure allusion to it in Dante. It is situated south of the western part of Centaurus, east of the keel of Argo. It is a small constellation of four chief stars arranged in the form of a cross. Its brightest star, the southernmost, is of about the first magnitude; the eastern, of a magnitude little darker; the northern, of about the second magnitude; and the western, of the third magnitude and faint. The constellation owes its striking effect to the circumstance that it subtends only about 6° from north to south, and still less from east to west. It looks more like a kite than a cross. All four stars are white except the second-magnitude, which is of a clear orange-color. It contains a fifth star of the fourth magnitude, which is very red.

Cruz (krōth), José Maria de la. Born at Concepcion, April 21, 1801: died near the same place, Nov. 25, 1875. A Chilian general. As a boy he was a cadet in the revolutionary army, serving in most of the campaigns. He rapidly rose in rank; became general of division in 1839; was twice minister of war and marine; was chief of staff in the Peruvian campaign of 1838, and held various other important positions. In 1851 he was the liberal candidate for president, but his opponent, General Montt, was elected. General Cruz then headed a revolt in the southern provinces, but was finally defeated at the battle of Longamilla, Dec. 8, 1851. He was pardoned, and thereafter lived in retirement on his estate.

During the colonial period he held important civil offices, and in 1806 made, at his own expense, an exploration of the Andes. His report of this journey was published in the Angelis collection at Buenos Ayres in 1835. He was one of the leaders of the revolution of 1810, and commanded a division of the patriot army, but was captured and imprisoned until released by the victories of 1817. Subsequently he was commandant at Talca, and, during the absence of O'Higgins, acting president of Chile; took part in the Peruvian campaign, and received the title of grand marshal from Peru; was a member of the constituent congress of Chile in 1826, and was minister of marine at the time of his death.

Cry of the Children, The. A poem by Mrs. Browning.

Crystal Palace. A building of iron and glass, erected in Hyde Park, London, for the great exhibition of 1851, and reërected at Sydenham, near London, 1852–53, opened 1854. It was designed by Sir Joseph Paxton, and is used for popular concerts and other entertainments, as well as a permanent exhibition of the art and culture of various nations. The nave is 1,608 feet long, the central transept 336 by 120 feet, and 175 high, and the south transept 312 feet long. A corresponding north transept was burned in 1866. The great nave, adorned with plants and statues, presents a unique view. The other side are ranged courts, in which are reproduced the architecture and sculpture of different civilizations. In 1853 a similar but much smaller building, called the Crystal Palace was erected for the World's Fair in New York, on Sixth Avenue between 40th and 42d streets. The ground is now a public park.

Ctesias (tē'shias). [Gr. Κτησίας.] Born at Cnidus, Caria, Asia Minor: died after 398 B. C. A Greek historian, physician at the court of Artaxerxes Mnemon. He wrote a history of Persia (Περσικά) in 24 books, fragments of which are extant, and a treatise on India (Ἰνδικά), parts of which also survive. There are meager abridgments of both works by Photius.

Ctesias, an abstract of whose works is preserved by Photius, is very frequently quoted by ancient authors. He was a Greek physician who accompanied the expedition led against Artaxerxes by his brother, the younger Cyrus. Though a few years younger, he was contemporary with Herodotus: his testimony therefore brings the series of evidence down to the very time of our author. Ctesias, having fallen into the hands of the Persians at the battle of Cunaxa, was detained at the court of Artaxerxes, during the next seventeen years; and it seems that, with the hope of recommending himself to the favour of "the great king," and of obtaining his own freedom, he undertook to compose a history of Persia, with the express and avowed design of impeaching the authority of Herodotus, whom, in no very courteous terms, he accuses of many falsifications. The jealousy and malice of a little mind is apparent in these accusations. Nothing can be much more inane than the fragments that are preserved of this author's two works — his History of Persia and his Indian History; yet, though possessing little intrinsic value, they serve an important purpose in furnishing very explicit evidence of the genuineness and general authenticity of the work which Ctesias laboured to depreciate. If the account given by Herodotus of Persian affairs had been altogether untrue, his rival wanted neither the will nor the means to expose the imposition. But what, like Thucydides, he cavils at minor points, he leaves the substance of the narrative uncontradicted.

Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 287.

Ctesibius (tē-sib'i-us). [Gr. Κτησίβιος.] Born at Alexandria: lived probably about 250 B. C. An Alexandrian physicist noted for his mechanical inventions. He is said to have invented a clepsydra, hydraulic organ, and other mechanical contrivances, and to have first applied the expansive force of air as a motive power.

Ctesiphon (tes'i-fon). [Gr. Κτησιφῶν.] In ancient geography, a city of Mesopotamia, situated on the Tigris, opposite Seleucia, 20 miles southeast of Bagdad. It was one of the chief cities of the Parthian and later Persian kingdoms. Its site is now occupied by ruins.

What encouragement the arts found from his (Chosroës I.) patronage we may learn from the remains of the great palace he erected at Ctesiphon. . . . The central arch of this wonderful structure is 85 feet high, 72 feet wide, and 150 feet deep. Although nothing now exists of this palace but the façade, we may judge from this what must have been the size and beauty of the structure before it had been destroyed by time and war.

Benjamin, Story of Persia, p. 231.

Ctesiphon. [Gr. Κτησιφῶν.] Lived in the 4th century B. C. An Athenian who proposed that Demosthenes should be honored with a crown, and for this was prosecuted by Æschines and defended by Demosthenes. See Crown, Oration on the.

Cuckoo and the Nightingale, The. A poem which appeared in the printed editions of Chaucer of the 16th century. When first printed it had following it a ballade with an envoy. There is nothing to indicate that they are by the same person. Tyrwhitt, who prints them, is inclined to doubt if we accept the ballade. The weight of evidence is against Chaucer's authorship of the poem. In the Bodleian MS. Fairfax 16 it is called "The Parliament of Love"; another MS. is headed "Liber Cupidinis." It is based on a popular superstition that he will be happy in love during the year who hears the nightingale before he hears the cuckoo.

Cucuta (kō-kō'tä), San José de. A town in Santander, Colombia, situated about lat. 7° 30′ N., near the frontier of Venezuela. Population (1892), about 9,000.

Cupid (kū'pid). [L. Cupido, a personification of cupido (cupidin-), desire, passion, from cupere, desire.] In Roman mythology, the god of love, identified with the Greek Eros, the son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus). He is generally represented as a beautiful boy with wings, carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows, and is often spoken of as blind or blindfolded. The name is often given in art to figures of children, with or without wings, introduced, sometimes in considerable number, as a motive of decoration, and with little or no mythological allusion.

Cupid, The Letter of. A poem by Hoccleve (Occleve) dated 1402, two years after Chaucer's death: attributed in the 1532 edition to Chaucer.

Cupid and Psyche (sī'kē). An episode in the "Golden Ass" of Apuleius. The beauty of Psyche, the youngest of three daughters of a certain king, and the homage paid to her, excite the wrath of Venus, who commands Cupid to avenge her. In the attempt he falls in love with Psyche: she is borne to a lovely valley where every night Cupid, the unseen lover, visits her and entertains her not to attempt to see him. Urged by her sisters and by her own curiosity, she violates this command, and is abandoned by the god. After toilsome wanderings in search of her lover, many sufferings, she is endowed with immortality by Jupiter and united to Cupid forever.

> Whatever may be the concealed meaning of the allegory, the story of Cupid and Psyche is certainly a beautiful fiction. Its antiquity and the number of translations and imitations may be considered as a proof. Mr. Rose, in the notes to his version of Partenopex de Blois, has pointed out its striking resemblance to that romance, as also to the Three Calenders, and other Oriental Arabian Tales. The prohibition of Cupid, and the transgression of Psyche, has suggested the Serpentin Vert of Mad. d'Aulnoy; indeed the labours to which Psyche is subjected seem to be the origin of all fairy tales, particularly Gracieuse et Percinet. The whole story has also been beautifully versified by Marino in his poem l'Adone. Cupid is introduced in the fourth book relating it for the amusement of Adonis, and he tells it in such a manner as to form the most pleasing epitome of the delightful poem. I need not mention the well-known imitation by Fontaine, nor the drama of Psyche, which was performed with the utmost magnificence at Paris in 1670, and is usually published in the works of Molière, but was in fact the effort of the united genius of that author, Corneille, Quinault, and Lulli. Nor have the moderns less contributed to the embellishment of this fable: the marriage of Cupid and Psyche has furnished Raphael with a series of paintings which are among the finest of his works, and which adorn the walls of the Farnese Palace in the vicinity of Rome.

He was appointed to a position in the Bodleian Library in 1834; undertook the cataloguing of Arabic books and MSS. in the British Museum (the first part of which catalogue appeared in 1846), and became chief assistant there in 1847, and keeper of Oriental manuscripts and printed books in 1861. He is best known from his work in classifying and, in part, editing the important collection of Syriac MSS. obtained by the British Museum from the monasteries of Nitrian Desert. His most important work was a MS. of the Epistles of Ignatius to Polycarp, which he edited in 1845. He also discovered parts of a Syriac version of the gospels differing from the Peshito version, and was the first to call attention to them.

Curiatii (kū-ri-ā'shi-ī). In Roman legend, three brothers from Alba Longa, who fought against the three Horatii. See Horatii.

Curicancha (kō-rē-kän'chä), or Coricancha (kō-rē-kän'chä). [Quichua, golden court.] The great temple called the Temple of the Sun, at Cuzco, Peru. According to tradition it was founded by Manco Capac. It was probably used as a palace by the earlier Incas, and was later turned into a temple. The great monarch Inca Yupanqui adorned the interior with gold. The temple opened on a large square: it was 290 feet long by 52 feet broad, and included the principal temple, various minor rooms, and the garden of golden flowers. The temple was partly lined with thin gold. An elliptical gold plate on the wall was an emblem of the deity, and it was flanked by gold and silver plates representing the sun and moon. The roof was of straw, or thatch. The temple was partly stripped by order of Atahualpa to satisfy the Spanish demand for gold. The Spaniards completed its destruction, and the church and convent of Santo Domingo were built on the site. Portions of the original walls are still visible, forming part of the convent structure.

The last expresses the real intention of the title.] A poem written about 1320, and founded on Cædmon's paraphrase of Genesis. It ran through the course of the world from the creation to doomsday. The whole poem has been printed by the Early English Text Society (ed. by Dr. Richard Morris).

Curtain (ker'tan), The. A London theater established in Shoreditch in 1576. It is thought that Shakspere acted here in his own plays. It remained open until the accession of Charles I., after which the drama gave way to exhibitions of athletic feats. It is said that it was called The Curtain because here the green curtain was first used: in 1678 Aubrey calls it "The Green curtain." The name is still maintained in "Curtain Road." The Church of St. James stands near the site, and a stained-glass window was placed at its west end in 1886 to commemorate the association with Shakspere.

Curtain Lectures. See Lectures.

Curtana (ker-tā'nä), Courtain (kōr-tān'), or Curtein (ker-tān'). [Sometimes, broken, short-ened.] The name originally given to the sword of Roland, of which, according to the tradition, the point was broken off in testing it. The name is also given to the pointless sword carried before the kings of England at their coronation, and emblematically considered as the sword of mercy. It is also called the sword of Edward the Confessor.

Cusa (kū'zä), or Cusanus (kū-zā'nus), Nikolaus (originally Nikolas Chrypffs or Krebs). Born at Kues, near Trier, Germany, 1401: died at Todi, Umbria, Italy, Aug. 11, 1464. A noted ecclesiastic and philosophical writer, appointed cardinal in 1448. His chief philosophical work is "De docta ignorantia."

Cush (kush). [Gr. Χοίν.] In the Old Testament: (a) The eldest son of Ham. (b) A geographical and ethnographical term usually rendered Ethiopia in the Vulgate and Septuagint. Cush corresponded probably to Upper Egypt and northern Nubia, including, perhaps, part of Abyssinia and southern Arabia. Also Kush.

The southern zone is described before the middle. "The sons of Ham," it is said, "were Cush, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan." Cush is not only Ethiopia, but also Ethiopia of the classical geographers, but also the southwestern coast of Arabia and the opposite coast of Africa as well. Mizraim corresponds to the land of Fun of the Egyptian monuments, as well as to Kesh or Ethiopia. It was inhabited for the most part by a white race whose physical characteristics connect them with the Egyptians (p. 51). Cush, the name for the Cushites of Egyptian origin, Kash vaguely denoted the country which lay between the First Cataract and the mountains of Abyssinia, and from the reign of Thothmes I. to the fall of the Twentieth Egyptian Dynasty the eldest son of the Egyptian monarch bore the title of "Royal Son" or Prince of Kash. In the reign of Amenophth, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, one of these Princes of Kash had the name of Mes, and may thus have originated the Jewish legend reported by Josephus, according to which Moses, the adopted son of an Egyptian princess, conquered Ethiopia. The land of Kas or Cush was thus, properly speaking, the region known as Ethiopia to the geographers of Greece and Rome. But it is certainly by no means that the name came to cover so wide an extent of country. At the outset it denoted only a small district on the southern side of the second Cataract. Thus, in Amenophth's inscription has been found enumerating the tribes conquered by Usertesen, of the Twelfth Dynasty, as he marched from the boundaries of Egypt up the Nile, "Almost at the head of them stands the tribe or district of Kash."

Cushing, Thomas. Born at Boston, Mass., March 24, 1725: died Feb. 28, 1788. An American politician, speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives 1763, and lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts 1779–88.

Cushing, William. Born at Scituate, Mass., March 1, 1732: died at Scituate, Sept. 13, 1810. An American jurist, appointed associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1789.

Cushing, William Barker. Born in Wisconsin, Nov., 1842: died at Washington, D. C., Dec. 7, 1874. An American naval officer, noted on account of his exploit in blowing up the Confederate iron-clad ram Albemarle at Plymouth, North Carolina, on the night of Oct. 29, 1864. See Albemarle.

Cushites (kush'its). The descendants of Cush; the inhabitants of Cush. In Gen. x. 6, Cush appears as the first son of Ham, while in verse 7 Dedan and Sheba, Arabic tribes, are enumerated among the descendants of Cush, and in verse 8 Nimrod, who is represented as the founder of the Babylonian kingdom, appears as the son of Cush. There are evidently two kinds of Cushites in the Old Testament, either two different races, or at least different settlements. The first are identical with the Kush, Kish, or Kesh of the Egyptian monuments, a name designating a reddish or reddish-brownish people living between Egypt and Abyssinia, and between the Nile and the sea: in the Assyrian inscriptions called Kusu or Milukhi. The Greek name Ethiopia comprised originally the dark-colored peoples of the southern countries of Africa and Asia at large; later it was appropriated to the Nile territory south of Egypt. The other division of the Cushites is to be looked for in the East, and is perhaps identical with the Kaśiu or Kassi of the inscriptions. See Cossæans.

Cushman (kush'man), Charlotte Saunders. Born in Boston, July 23, 1816: died in Boston, Feb. 8, 1876. An American actress. She first appeared at New Orleans, at the age of nineteen, as Lady Macbeth. She acted with Macready in New York 1842–43, and in Boston in 1844. She played at the Princess's Theatre in London in the autumn of 1844, and in 1845 was very successful as Bianca. In December, 1845, she appeared as Romeo at the Haymarket, her sister Susan playing Juliet. She reappeared in America, Oct. 8, 1849, at the old Broadway Theater, New York, as Mrs. Hailer. Her principal characters were Romeo, Wolsey, Hamlet, and Claude Melnotte. In 1852 she announced her intention of retiring from the stage, but occasionally acted until her last illness. Meg Merrilies and Nancy Sykes were her strongest melodramatic parts.

Cushman, Robert. Born in England about 1580: died in England, 1625. An English merchant, one of the founders of the Plymouth colony.

Cusis (kū'sis). A fabulous country in Sir John Mandeville's "Voiage and Travaile." The people of this country have but one foot, so large that it casts a shadow over the whole body when used as a protection from the sun, and with this one foot they make wonderful speed.

Cust (kust), Robert Needham. Born at Cockayne-Hatley, Bedfordshire, England, 1821. A noted Orientalist and Africanist. He entered the civil service of India in 1843, and retired in 1869. Since that date he has resided in London. His principal works are "Sketch of the Modern Languages of the East Indies" (1878), "Linguistic and Oriental Essays" (1880–91), "Sketch of the Modern Languages of Africa" (1883), "Notes on Missionary Subjects" (1887), "Africa Rediviva" (1891).

Custance. See Constance.

Custer (kus'ter), George Armstrong. Born at New Rumley, Ohio, Dec. 5, 1839: died in Montana, June 25, 1876. An American soldier. He was graduated at West Point in 1861, and was assigned to duty as lieutenant in the 2d Cavalry. He then joined a brigade of volunteers in the battle of Gettysburg July 1–3, 1863; was appointed to the command of a division of cavalry in the volunteer service Sept. 30, 1864, and took part in the Richmond campaign in 1864, in the Shenandoah campaign from 1864–65, and in the pursuit of Lee's army after the evacuation of Richmond in April. He was mustered out of the volunteer service, with the rank of major-general, in 1866, and in the same year was appointed lieutenant-colonel, with the brevet rank of major-general, in the regular army. He commanded an unsuccessful expedition to the Black Hills in 1874. He led with his regiment General Terry's column in the expedition against the Sioux Indians in 1876. Coming upon a large Indian encampment on the Little Big Horn River, Montana, he divided his regiment into several detachments, one of which under Major Reno was ordered to attack the enemy in the rear, while he himself advanced with five companies in front. Major Reno was driven back, and the Indians concentrated upon Custer, who was killed together with his whole force.

Custine (küs-tēn'), Adam Philippe de, Count. Born at Metz, Feb. 4, 1740: guillotined at Paris, Aug. 28, 1793. A noted French soldier. He fought under Soubise in the Seven Years' War, and was quartermaster-general of the French army in America 1778–83, being present at the surrender of Yorktown, Virginia, 1781. He was deputed to the States General in 1789, and in 1792 was appointed to the command of an army. He took Spires Sept. 30, and Mainz Oct. 23, 1792; but failing in the campaign of 1793 to relieve Mainz, which had been recaptured by the Allies, he was executed on the charge of conniving at a counter-revolution.

Custine, Marquis Astolphe de. Born at Niederwiller (Meurthe), France, March 18, 1790: died near Pau, France, Sept. 29, 1857. A French writer and traveler, grandson of Adam P. de Custine. He wrote "Mémoires et voyages," etc., 1830), "La Russie en 1839" (1843), etc.

Custis (kus'tis), George Washington Parke. Born at Mount Airy, Md., April 30, 1781: died at Arlington House, Fairfax County, Virginia, Oct. 10, 1857. An American writer, adopted son of George Washington.

Custom of the Country, The. A play by Fletcher and Massinger, produced before 1628 and printed in 1647. It is partly from a story of Cervantes, and partly from one in Painter's "Palace of Pleasure." "Love makes a Man," by Cibber, and "Country Lasses," by Charles Johnson, were partly taken from it.

Custom of the Country, The. A play by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1715. It was originally a farce called "A Bickerstaff's Burial," said, doubtfully, to be founded on one of Sinbad's voyages.

Custozza (kös-tōd'zä), or Custoza (kös-tōt'sä). A village in the province of Verona, Italy, 11 miles southwest of Verona. It was the scene of two battles: (1) On July 25, 1848, the Austrians (about 33,000) under Radetzky defeated the Sardinians (about 25,000) under King Charles Albert. (2) On June 24, 1866, the Austrians (75,000?) under the archduke Albert defeated the Italians (130,000?) under Victor Emmanuel.

Cutch Gundava. See Kachh Gandava.

Cuthah (kū'thä). A city in Babylonia whence Shalmaneser IV. (727–722 B. C.) brought colonists into Samaria (2 Ki. xvii. 24). These Cutheans, mingling with other peoples, became the progenitors of the Samaritans. In the cuneiform inscriptions the city is often mentioned under the name of Kutu. It was situated a little to the east of Babylon, and is now represented by the ruins of Tel Ibrahim. The statement (2 Ki. xvii. 30) that the principal god of the Cutheans was Nergal (the god of war) is confirmed by the inscriptions. Nebuchadnezzar (604–561) records that he restored the temple of Nergal in the city of Cuthah.

Cuthbert (kuth'bert), Saint. Died at Farne, Northumbria, March 20, 687. A noted English monk. He was prior of Melrose about 664, and later of Lindisfarne, and bishop of Lindisfarne 685–687.

Cutler (kut'lėr), Manasseh. Born at Killingly, Conn., May 3, 1742; died at Hamilton, Mass., July 28, 1825. An American botanist and Congregational clergyman, one of the founders of Marietta, Ohio, in 1788.

Cutler, Timothy. Born at Charlestown, Mass., about 1684: died at Boston, Aug. 17, 1765. An American clergyman, president of Yale College 1719–22.

Cutpurse (kut'pėrs), Moll. The nickname of a notorious woman (real name Mary Frith) who was born in London in 1588 according to her life published anonymously in London 1662, but according to Malone in 1584. She was a riotous "thief, pickpocket, bully, prostitute, procuress, fortune-teller, receiver of stolen goods, and forger of writings," and nearly always wore a man's dress. She is said to have been the first woman who used tobacco. She was introduced by Middleton and Dekker as the chief personage (but in reformed character) in their play "The Roaring Girl." Field also introduces her in his play "Amends for Ladies."

Cuttack (kut-tak'), or Cattack, or Katak. 1. A district in the Orissa division, Bengal, British India, bounded on the east and southeast by the Bay of Bengal. Area, 3,517 square miles. Population (1901), 1,805,332. — 2. The capital of the above district, situated on the river Mahanadi in lat. 20° 26′ N., long. 85° 55′ E. It was taken from the Mahrattas by the British in 1803.

Cutter of Coleman Street, The. A play by Abraham Cowley, performed in 1661 and printed in 1663. This comedy was originally called "The Guardian," and was written for the entertainment of Prince Charles as he passed through Cambridge in 1641.

Cuttle (kut'l), Captain Edward. In Dickens's "Dombey and Son," a kind-hearted, salt-looking old retired sailor with a hook in place of his right hand. He is a friend of Sol Gills, the ship-instrument-maker. One of his favorite expressions is "When found, make a note on."

Cuvier (kü-vyā'), Frédéric. Born at Montbéliard, Doubs, France, June 27, 1773: died at Strasburg, July 17, 1838. A French naturalist, brother of Georges. He became director of the menagerie of the Jardin des Plantes in 1804, and in 1827 was appointed professor of comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes. He wrote "Des dents des mammifères, considérées comme caractères zoologiques" (1825), and (in cooperation with Geoffroy St. Hilaire) "Histoire naturelle des mammifères" (1819–39).

Cuvier, Baron Georges Léopold Chrétien Frédéric Dagobert. Born at Montbéliard, Doubs, France, Aug. 23, 1769: died at Paris, May 13, 1832. A celebrated French naturalist, the founder of the science of comparative anatomy. He was educated at the gymnasium at Montbéliard and the Academia Carolina at Stuttgart; was tutor in the family of Comte d'Hericy 1788–94; became assistant professor of comparative anatomy at the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle in 1795, member of the National Institute in 1795, professor of natural history in the Collège de France in 1800, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences in 1803, and councilor of the Imperial University in 1808; was appointed councilor of state by Napoleon in 1814, was admitted to the French Academy in 1818; was president of the Committee of the Interior 1819–32; received the title of baron in 1826; was appointed superintendent of the faculty of Protestant Theology in 1822; was made grand officer of the Legion of Honor in 1825; and was created a peer of France in 1831. His chief works are "Le règne animal" ("The Animal Kingdom," 1817), "Anatomie comparée" (1800–05), "Recherches sur les ossements fossiles" (1812), "Histoire naturelle des poissons," conjointly with Valenciennes (1828–49).

Cuxhaven (kuks-hä'vn; G. pron. kóks'hä-fen). A seaport in the state of Hamburg, Germany, situated at the mouth of the Elbe 57 miles northwest of Hamburg. It is now united with Ritzebuttel. It is a sea-bathing resort, and contains a castle.

Cuyabá (kwē-yä-bä'), or Cuiabá. 1. A river in western Brazil which joins the Paraguay, through the São Lourenço, about lat. 18° S. It is navigable to the town of Cuyabá. — 2. The capital of the province of Matto Grosso, Brazil, situated on the river Cuyabá in lat. 15° 36′ S., long. 56° 3′ W. It was settled in 1721, and was long the center of rich gold-washings. Population (1892), about 20,000.

Cuyahoga (ki-a-hō'gȧ). A river in northern Ohio which flows into Lake Erie at Cleveland. Length, 80–90 miles.

Cuyamungge (kwē-yä-mung'gē). [Tehua of northern New Mexico, signifying 'the village of the rolling stone.'] An Indian pueblo of the Tehuas, 15 miles north of Santa Fé, on the banks of the stream of Tezuque. It was abandoned in 1696, and is now a ruin. A severe engagement was fought near the place, in 1694, between the Spaniards and the Tehua Indians who had risen against Diego de Vargas.

Cuyo (kö'yō). A region of Spanish South America, situated east of the Andes, and extending from about lat. 23° to 35° 3′ S., and eastward, in parts, to long. 63° W. It was originally settled from Chile, and remained a province of that captain-generalcy until 1776, when it was united to the new vicerovalty of Buenos Ayres. The limits were never definitely fixed, and the name is now obsolete.

Cuyp, or Kuyp (koip), Albert. Born at Dort, Netherlands, 1605; died at Dort, 1691. A Dutch landscape-painter.

Cuyp, Jakob Gerrits. Born 1575: died 1651. A Dutch painter, father of Albert Cuyp.

Cuza. See Alexander John, Prince of Rumania.

Cuzco (kö'zō'kō). [Quichua, 'navel' or 'center,' a name first given to the city.] 1. A department of Peru. Area, 26,285 square miles. Population, 238,445. — 2. The capital of the above department, situated in lat. 13° 31′ S., long. 72° 5′ W., about 11,380 feet above sea-level. It contains a cathedral, several convents, etc. It was founded, according to tradition, by Manco Capac in the 11th century: was the capital of the empire of the Incas, and was noted for its Temple of the Sun (see Coricancha) and the celebrated fortress of the Incas (see Sacsahuana). It was entered by Pizarro Nov. 15, 1533, and was besieged and partly burned by Manco Inca in 1536. Population, 35,576.

Cyaxares (si-aks'g-rēz). King of the Medes 635–584 B. C. In the cuneiform inscriptions his name is Uwakshatara. He may be considered as the founder of Media's power and greatness. After repelling the hordes of the Scythians, he captured (606 B. C.), in alliance with Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylonia, Nineveh, and destroyed the Assyrian empire. Toward the west Cyaxares conquered Armenia, and thus extended his dominion as far as the river Halys in Asia Minor. He even attempted the conquest of Lydia on the other side of the Halys, but had to desist on account of an eclipse which he took for a warning from the gods.

Cybele (sib'e-lē), or Rhea (rē'ȧ). In Greek mythology, the wife of Cronos (Saturnus), and mother of the Olympian gods: hence called the "Great Mother of the Gods." The original home of her worship was Phrygia (Asia Minor). Her priests were called Corybantes, and festivals were celebrated with wild dances and orgiastic excesses and the resounding music of drums and cymbals. She was connected as Dea Syriaca with Atargatis in a chief shrine at Hierapolis. From Asia her worship came to Greece and during the second Punic war in 204 B. C. it was introduced into Rome, where the Megalesia, later also the Taurobolia and Criobolia, were celebrated in her honor. The oak, pine, and lion were sacred to her. She is usually represented enthroned between lions, with a diadem on her head and a small drum in her hand, the instrument used in her rites, in her hand. See also Attis.

Cyclades (sik'la-dēz). [Gr. Κυκλάδες, from κύκλος, a circle.] A group of islands belonging to Greece, situated in the Ægean Sea: so called from the belief that they formed a ring about Delos. They were originally twelve in number: Andros, Teños, Kea, Naxos, Paros, Ios, Thera, now form, with neighboring islands, the nomarchy of Cyclades, capital, Hermopolis. Area, 923 square miles. Population (1896), 134,000.

Cyclic poets, The. The authors of Greek epic poems, composed between 800 B. C. and 550 B. C., relating to the Trojan war and the war against Thebes. See Epic cycle. Among these poems are "Cypria" (The Cypian Lays"), "Ilioupersis" (The Lay of Ilion"), "Nostoi" (The Homeward Voyages"), "Telegonia" ("The Lay of Telegonus") (all belonging to the Trojan cycle), and the "Thebais" and the "Epigoni" (belonging to the Theban cycle). A few fragments of these poems are extant.

Cyclops (sī'klops), or Cyclopes (sī-klō'pēz). [Gr. pl. Κύκλωπες, the round-eyed.] In Greek mythology, a race of one-eyed giants, represented in the Homeric cycle of legends as Sicilian shepherds. See Polyphemus.

Cydippe. See Acontius.

Cydnus (sid'nus). In ancient geography, a river of Cilicia, Asia Minor, which flows into the Mediterranean Sea about 12 miles south of Tarsus: now called Tersus.

Cydonia (si-dō'ni-ȧ). [Gr. Κυδωνία or Κυδωνίς.] In ancient geography, a city on the northwestern coast of Crete, near the site of the modern Canea (which see).

Cygnus (sig'nus). [L., 'the Swan.'] An ancient northern constellation representing a bird called a swan by Ovid and others, and now always so considered.

Cymbeline (sim'be-lin). A drama by Shakspere, produced probably about 1609 or 1610; so called from one of the chief characters, a semi-mythical king (Cunobelinus) in Britain. Part of the play was no doubt derived from Holinshed, the part relating to Iachimo is to Boccaccio's "Decameron." It was first published in the folio of 1623. Garrick produced his alteration in 1761.

Cymoclites. See Pyrochles.

Cymry, or Kymry (kim'ri). [W. Cymry, pl. of Cymro, a Welshman; cf. Cymru, Wales, Cambria, Wales. The origin of the name is unknown: some connect it with W. cymmer, a confluence of waters; cf. aber, inver-.] The name given to themselves by the Welsh. In its wider application the term is often applied to that division of the Celtic race which is more nearly akin with the Welsh, including also the Cornishmen and the Bretons or Armoricans, as distinguished from the Gaidhelic division. Also written Cimry, Cymry.

Cynægirus (sin-ē-jī'rus). [Gr. Κυνέγειρος.] An Athenian soldier, brother of Æschylus. He distinguished himself at the battle of Marathon 490 B. C., in which, according to Homer, he pursued the Persians to the sea, and, having seized one of their triremes to prevent its putting off, fell with his right hand severed. Later writers add that, having lost both his hands, he seized the vessel with his teeth.

Cynewulf (kin'e-wulf). Lived probably in the 8th century A. D. A Northumbrian (?) poet. He was a scop or bard, but there is no evidence that he was a priest. He was the author of "Elene," "Juliana," "Crist," "Eddikes Cwide," "Phoenix," "Guthlac," and the reputed author of the "Wanderer," etc. Even "Beowolf" has been credited to him.

Cynewulf the poet was unknown until the runes were read by which he had worked his name into his poems of "Elene." Those runes were first read in the year 1840 by two independent workers — by Jacob Grimm in his edition of "Andreas" and "Elene," and by John Mitchell Kemble in his essay upon Anglo-Saxon Runes, published that year in the "Archæologia." Each discoverer of the name endeavored to find who Cynewulf was, and when he lived. Grimm placed him in the 8th century. Kemble placed him in the end of the 10th century and the beginning of the 11th, by suggesting that he was the Cynewulf who was Abbot of Peterborough between the years 992 and 1006, who succeeded Aelfeage as Bishop of Winchester in the year 1008. Morley, English Writers, II. 206.

Cynics (sin'iks). [See Cynosarges.] A sect of Greek philosophers founded by Antisthenes of Athens (born about 444 B. C.), who sought to develop the ethical teachings of Socrates, whose pupil he was. The chief doctrines of the Cynics were that virtue is the only good, that the essence of virtue is self-control, and that pleasure is an evil if sought for its own sake. They were accordingly characterized by an ostentatious contempt for riches, art, science, and amusements. The most famous Cynic was Diogenes of Sinope, a pupil of Antisthenes, who carried the doctrines of the school to an extreme and ridiculous asceticism, and is improbably said to have slept in a tub which he carried about with him.

Cynosarges (si-nos-sär'jēz). A gymnasium of very early foundation in ancient Athens, combined with a sanctuary of Hercules, and possessing a grove. The philosopher Antisthenes taught here, and his school was hence called the Cynic. The Cynosarges lay somewhat high up on the southern slope of Lycabettus; its site is now occupied by the Monastery of the Asomaton and the British and American schools of archæology.

Cynoscephalæ (sin-os-sef'a-lē). [Gr. Κυνὸς κεφαλαί, dog's heads.] Heights in Thessaly, Greece, 10–20 miles southeast of Larissa. Here, 364 B. C., the Thebans under Pelopidas defeated Alexander of Pheræ; and in 197 B. C. the Romans under Flamininus defeated Philip V. of Macedon.

Cynosura (si-nō-sū'rȧ). [Gr. Κυνοσουρά, dog's tail.] 1. In Greek mythology, a nymph of Ida, and nurse of Zeus, metamorphosed into the constellation Ursa Minor. — 2. The constellation of the Little Bear, containing the star which is now, but was not then, the polestar (which forms the tip of the tail), and thus often the object to which the eyes of mariners were directed.

Cynthia (sin'thi-ȧ). 1. One of the names of Artemis or Diana, the moon-goddess, derived from Mount Cynthus in Delos, her birthplace. The name is given in Spenser's "Colin Clout's Come Home Again" and in Fletcher's "Purple Island" to a sort of personification of Queen Elizabeth. Raleigh also sung her praises as Cynthia in his poem of that name, of which we have only a few books. Ben Jonson, under the same name, flatters her in "Cynthia's Revels." — 2. In Congreve's "Double Dealer," a flippant fine lady, the daughter of Lord and Lady Pliant, in love with Mellefont.

Cynthiana (sin-thi-a'nȧ). The county-seat of Harrison County, Kentucky, situated on the South Licking River 48 miles south of Cincinnati. It was the scene of engagements in Morgan's raids in 1862 and 1864. Population (1890), 3,046.

Cynthia's Revels, or The Fountain of Self-Love. A "comicall satyre" by Ben Jonson, acted by the Children of the Queen's Chapel in 1600. It was printed in quarto in 1601 (Bullen), in folio in 1616, the latter with large additions.

Cynthius (sin'thi-us). An epithet of Apollo, the sun-god, as the moon-goddess is called Cynthia.

Cynthus (sin'thus). In ancient geography, a mountain in Delos, from which are derived Cynthia and Cynthius, the surnames, respectively, of Artemis and Apollo.

Cynuria (sī-nū'ri-ä). [Gr. Κυνουρία.] In ancient geography, a district in the eastern part of the Peloponnesus, situated on the Gulf of Argolis. It probably corresponded to the region near the modern Astros.

Cynuria, or Cynosuria, as it is called by Thucydides (iv. 56 and v. 41), was the border territory between Sparta and Argos upon the coast. It was a small tract consisting of a single valley (that of Lukvu) and of the adjoining hills; but it was of great importance, as commanding the passes which formed the natural communication between the two countries. Hence it was for so long a time an object of contention between them. Rome finally adjudged it to Argolis. Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 353, note.

Cyparissus (sip-a-ris'us). [Gr. Κυπάρισσος.] In Greek mythology, a youth, a son of Telephus. He accidentally killed his favorite stag, and was so overcome with grief that Apollo metamorphosed him into a cypress.

Cypria (sip'ri-ä), or Cyprian Lays (sip'ri-an laz). One of the poems of the Trojan cycle, anciently attributed to Homer, and later to Stasinus, or Hegesias, or Hegesinus: so named either from the home of the author (Cyprus), or because it celebrated the Cyprian Aphrodite. It served as an introduction to the Iliad, relating the first nine years of the siege of Troy.

Cyprian (sip'ri-an), Saint (Thascius Cæcilius Cyprianus). [L. Cyprianus, of Cyprus.] Beheaded at Carthage, Sept. 14, 258. An ecclesiastic and martyr of the African Church, elected bishop of Carthage in 248. He was converted to Christianity at an advanced age. His festival was originally kept on Holy Cross Day, and was transferred to Sept. 16. The present English calendar gives him Sept. 26, which was at one time also given to another Saint Cyprian of Antioch, the magician.

Cyprus (sī'prus). [Gr. Κύπρος, F. Chypre, G. Cypern, It. Cipro, Turk. Kibris.] One of the largest islands of the Mediterranean, situated in its eastern corner, south of Cilicia, with the range of the Lebanon on the east and that of Taurus on the north. Its name is supposed to be derived from its rich mines of copper (Gr. κυπρος). It was celebrated in antiquity as the birthplace and favorite abode of Aphrodite, and was famous for its beauty and wealth, but also for its licentiousness. It was early settled by Phœnicians, who were followed by Greeks. Its principal cities were Paphos on the western coast (a center of the cult of Aphrodite), Salamis on the eastern, Citium on the southeastern, and Amathus on the southern. In the center of the island were the Phenician mining cities Tamassus and Idalium, with the celebrated grove of Aphrodite. For a time Cyprus was tributary to Assyria. Its name in the cuneiform inscriptions is Yatnana, and Sargon (722–705 B. C.) relates that seven kings from this island (probably the chiefs of the Phenician colonies) brought him costly gifts and "kissed his feet," in acknowledgment of his sovereignty. He in turn presented them with a marble stele containing a full-length sculptured portrait of himself, and an inscription commemorating his principal deeds. This monument was found in 1846, well preserved, near Larnaka (the ancient Citium), and is at present in the Royal Museum of Berlin. Afterward Cyprus was in succession subject to Egyptian, Persian, and Macedonian supremacy. In 58 B. C. it became a Roman province. In the 9th century Cyprus fell into the hands of the Saracens, during the crusades in the 12th century it became a Christian kingdom under Richard I. In 1574 it was taken by the Turks. Cyprus is administered by England, according to a convention between Turkey and England in 1878. Its chief officer is a high commissioner, and there is partial self-government. Capital, Nicosia. Area, 3,584 square miles. Population (1891), 209,286. In 1871 was discovered a bilingual inscription, in Cypriote and Phenician writing, which supplied the key to the ancient Cypriote alphabet. Opinions on the source and origin of this ancient alphabet, which is syllabic, are divided. Dr. Deeke, for instance, derives it from the Assyro-Babylonian cuneiform alphabet, which is also syllabic; while Professor Sayce, followed by W. Wright, would see its ultimate source in the supposed Hittite hieroglyphic inscriptions found throughout Asia Minor. (See Hittites.) Cyprus is frequently mentioned in the New Testament (Acts iv. 36, xiii. 4), and is often referred to in the Old Testament by the name of Chittim (which see). A large number of antiquities were unearthed there by General di Cesnola, which are now in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. His explorations have been the subject of much discussion and skepticism.

Cypselus (sip'se-lus). [Gr. Κύψελος.] A tyrant of Corinth about 655–625 B. C.

Cyrenaica (sir-ē-nā'i-kä), or Pentapolis (pen-tap'ō-lis). In ancient geography, a country in northern Africa, lying between the Mediterranean on the north, Marmarica on the east, the desert on the south, and Syrtis Major on the west. It corresponded nearly to the modern Barca, and was noted for its fertility. It was settled by Phœnicians about 631 B. C.; was subject to Egypt about 323 B. C.; formed with Crete a Roman province in 67 B. C.; and was ruined by invasions of Persians and Saracens in the 7th century A. D.

Cyrenaics (sī-ē-nā'iks). [From Gr. Κυρήνη, Cyrene.] A school of Greek hedonistic philosophers, founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates.

Cyrene (sī-rē'nē). [Gr. Κυρήνη.] In Greek mythology, a nymph, mother of Aristæus.

Cyrene. [Gr. Κυρήνη.] In ancient geography, the principal city of Cyrenaica, situated about 10 miles from the Mediterranean, in lat. 32° 45′ N., long. 21° 50′ E. It was founded by Therians, under Battus, about 631 B. C. (see Cyrenaica), and was a seat of Greek learning and culture. The modern Ghrennah, on its site, contains many antiquities. It was the birthplace of Aristippus, Eratosthenes, and other celebrated men.

Cyril (sir'il), Saint, of Alexandria. [L. Cyrillus, Gr. Κυρίλλος, lordly.] Born at Alexandria: died at Alexandria, June, 444. An ecclesiastic and theologian. He succeeded his uncle Theophilus as archbishop of Alexandria in 412. Animated by an intemperate zeal for the cause of orthodoxy, he despoiled the Novatians of their church property, and expelled the Jews from the city. He is said to have instigated his monks to murder the pagan philosopher Hypatia (415 ?). He began in 428 to oppose the doctrines of Nestorius, and in 431 presided over the Council of Ephesus, at which Nestorius was condemned as a heretic. His works, chiefly controversial, were edited by Aubert in 1638. He is commemorated on 9 mâit in the Greek, Roman, and Anglican churches on Jan. 28.

Cyril, Saint, of Jerusalem. Born at or near Jerusalem about 315: died about 386. An ecclesiastic and orthodox controversialist. He succeeded Maximus as bishop of Jerusalem in 350. He carried on a controversy with Acacius, an Arian bishop of Cæsarea, which procured his deposition in 357. After various changes of fortune, he was finally restored in 381. His works, which consist chiefly of catechetical lectures, were edited by Touttée in 1720.

Cyril, Saint (or Constantine). Born at Thessalonica about 820: died Feb. 14, 869 (?). A scholar and prelate, surnamed "the Apostle of the Slavs." He engaged with his brother Methodius in missionary labors among the Moravians, Bulgarians, and other Slavic nations. He introduced the "Cyrillic" alphabet into the Old Slavic language.

Cyril Lucar (Cyrillus Lucaris). Born in Crete, 1572: strangled at Constantinople, 1638. A reforming patriarch of the Greek Church. He became patriarch of Constantinople in 1621, and sent the "Codex Alexandrinus" to England in 1628.

Cyropædia (sī-rō-pē-dī'ä), The. [Gr. Κύρου παιδεία, the education of Cyrus.] A work of Xenophon, in eight books, describing the education of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire, his great deeds, and his dying advice to his sons and ministers.

Education of Cyrus (Cyropædia), a very diffuse political novel, in which he sets forth his ideal picture as a biography of the older and greater Cyrus, in opposition to the dreams of Plato and other theoretical politicians of the day. . . . Cyrus is a mixture of truth and romance. The bitious of Xenophon's writings, but consequently the most tedious and the least read, seems to be our earliest specimen of a romance in Greek prose literature.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 280.

Cyrrhestica (si-res'ti-kä). In ancient geography, a region in northern Syria, west of the Euphrates and south of Commagene.

Cyrus (sī'rus). [Gr. Κῦρος; in the Old Testament Koresh; in the cuneiform inscriptions Kurash, Kurshu; OPers. Kuros.] The founder of the Persian empire (559–529 B. C.), called "The Great." His birth and early years are surrounded by myths and legends (see Mandane). The information obtained from the inscriptions, among them a cylinder of Cyrus himself discovered in the ruins of Babylon and Sepharvaim (Sippar), combined with the records of the Greek historians (Herodotus, Xenophon, and Ctesiphon), may be summarized as follows: He calls himself on his cylinder "the worshiper of Merodach," and the great-grandson of Shishpish (Theispes), "King of Anshan. Anshan is evidently identical with Anzan, the plain of Susa, and stands for Elam. He was descended by Theispes, the son of Achæmenes, founder of the dynasty. In 549 Cyrus, after conquering Ecbatana, dethroned Astyages, king of Media, and united Media with Persia. He then directed his arms against the Lydian kingdom of Cræsus (who made an offensive and defensive alliance with Nabonidus, king of Babylonia, and Amasis, king of Egypt), and took its capital Sardis in 546 by surprise. The ensuing years Cyrus used for consolidating his power in the conquered countries. In 538 he marched with a large army against Babylonia, Sepharvaim (Sippara) was captured without fighting; Nabonidus, who defended it, fled; and two days afterward Babylon itself, which was held by Nabonidus's son Belshazzar, fell into the hands of the conqueror, likewise "without battle and fight," as he records. According to Daniel, Nabonidus after the fall of Babylon fortified himself in Borsippa; the city was besieged by Cyrus; and after it had capitulated he treated it and Nabonidus himself with mercy, allowing the latter to make his residence in Carmania. It is certain that he showed great generosity and consideration to the conquered capital (Babylon), sparing its inhabitants and their religious feelings: he even represented himself as having been called by Merodach (Marduk), the god of the city, to avenge his neglect at the hands of the preceding kings. Cyrus's attitude to the Jewish exiles in Babylonia is known from their fellow-countryman (Ezra i.). He permitted them to return to their own country, rebuild Jerusalem, and restore the temple, and even returned to them the vessels of the temple which were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar. His death, like his birth, is somewhat shrouded in legend. The most common view is that he fell in battle with the Massagetes on the river Jaxartes.

There is much reason to believe that the tomb of Cyrus still exists at Murg-Aab, the ancient Pasargadæ. On a square base, composed of immense blocks of beautiful white marble, rising in steps, stands a structure so closely resembling the description of Arrian, that it seems scarcely possible to doubt its being the tomb which in Alexander's time contained the body of Cyrus. It is a quadrangular house, or rather chamber, built of huge blocks of marble, 5 feet thick, which are shaped at the top into a sloping roof. Internally the chamber is 10 feet long, 7 wide, and 8 high. There are holes in the marble floor, which seem to have admitted the fastenings of a sarcophagus. The tomb stands in an area marked out by pillars, whereon occurs repeatedly the inscription (written both in Persian and in the so-called Median), "I am Cyrus, king, the Achæmenian." Rawlinson, Herod., I. 333, note.

Cythna (sith'nä). A character in Shelley's poem "The Revolt of Islam."

Cyzicus (siz'i-kus), or Cyzicum (-kum). [Gr. Κύζικος.] In ancient geography, the peninsula projecting from Mysia, Asia Minor, into the Sea of Marmora; also, the Greek town on its isthmus. Among its ruins are: (a) A Roman amphitheater of the 2d century A. D. The ruins still rise to a height of 65 feet, built of rubble faced with rusticated masonry in grand style. There are 23 arched entrances in the lower story. The longer axis of the ellipse is 325 feet. (b) A temple of Hadrian, dedicated A. D. 167, and greatly admired in antiquity. It was a Corinthian peripteros of 6 by 15 columns, of white marble. The cella was small, without pronaos or opisthodomos; there were 4 interior rows of columns in front, and 3 behind. The temple measured 112 by 201 feet. The cella 70 by 140. The columns were 7 feet in base-diameter and 70 high (the highest of any classical temple). The pediments and the cella were richly adorned. (c) An octostyle temple, apparently contemporaneous with the amphitheater, in part built up of rough masonry and faced with marble. The diameter is 238 feet.

Dabaiba (dä-bī'bä), or Dabaybe (dä-bī'bā), or Davaive (dä-vī'vā), or Abibe (ä-bē'be). A name given in the early part of the 16th century to a region south of the Isthmus of Panama, somewhere in the vicinity of the Atrato River. It was probably the appellation of a chief, or his tribe, transferred by the Spaniards to the territory over which he ruled. According to reports Dabaiba contained a temple lined with gold, where human sacrifices were made. Balboa vainly searched for this temple in 1512 and 1513, and it was long an object of the Spanish expeditions.

Dabbat (dab'bat). [Ar. dibbatu 'l-ard, the reptile of the earth.] In Mohammedan belief, "a monster who shall arise in the last day, and shall cry unto the people of the earth that mankind have not believed in the revelations of God." Dachstein (däch'stin). One of the chief peaks of the North Limestone Alps, in the Salzkammergut, Austria-Hungary, about 18 miles south of Ischl. Height, 9,830 feet.

Dacia (dā'shi-ä). [L. Dacia, Gr. Δακία; from Daci, Gr. Δακοί, Δάκοι, Δάοι, the inhabitants.] 1. A province of the Roman Empire, lying between the Carpathian Mountains on the north, the Theiss on the west, the Danube on the south, and the Dniester on the east. It corresponded to modern Rumania, Transylvania, part of Hungary, and perhaps also Bukowina. The inhabitants were the Getæ or Daci. It was invaded by Alexander the Great in 335 B. C., by Lysimachus about 292 B. C., and its people defeated the generals of Domitian 81–96 A. D. It was conquered by Trajan in 101 and succeeding years, and made a Roman province. It was abandoned by the Romans in the reign of Aurelian, 270–275.

Trajan now formed the lands between the Theiss and the Danube, the Dniester and the Carpathian Mountains into the Roman province of Dacia. The last province to be won was the first to be given up; for Aurelian withdrew from it, and transferred its name to the Mœsian land immediately south of the Danube.
Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 70.

Cut off, as it has been for so many ages from all Roman influences, forming, as it has done, one of the great highways of barbarian migration, a large part of Dacia, namely the modern Roumanian principality, still keeps its Roman language no less than Spain and Gaul. In one way the land is to this day more Roman than Spain or Gaul, as its people still call themselves by the Roman name.
Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 71.

2. A diocese in the northern part of the later Roman prefecture of Illyricum (Servia and western Bulgaria).

Dacier (dä-syā'), André. Born at Castres, France, April 6, 1651: died at Paris, Sept. 18, 1722. A French classical scholar and academician. He translated (for the use of the Dauphin) Valerius Flaccus, Horace, Epictetus, Aristotle's "Poetics," etc.

Dactyls (dak'tilz), or Dactyli (dak'ti-li), or Daktyloi (-loi). [Gr. Δάκτυλοι.] In classical mythology, supernatural and magical beings living on Mount Ida in Phrygia, the discoverers of iron and copper and of the art of working them. They were transferred, in the legends, to Mount Ida in Crete, and were there identified with the Curetes, Corybantes, etc. Their number, originally three, was increased, in various accounts of them, to ten, and even to one hundred.

Dadu. See Rammun.

Dædalus (dē'da-lus or ded'a-lus). [Gr. Δαίδαλος.] In Greek legend, an Athenian, son of Metion and grandson of Erechtheus. He was regarded as the personification of all handicrafts and of art, and as such was worshiped by artists' gilds in various places, especially in Attica, and was a central figure in various myths. He was said to have made various improvements in the fine arts, including architecture, and to have invented many mechanical appliances, as the ax, the awl, and the bevel. For the murder of his nephew Talos, of whose inventive skill he was jealous, he was driven to Crete, where he constructed the famous labyrinth, in which he, with his son Icarus, was confined for furnishing the clue of it to Ariadne. In another legend a different account of his imprisonment is given.) Escaping, he and Icarus fled over sea on wings of wax which he had made. Icarus soared too near the sun, his wings melted, and he fell into the sea, which was called for him the Icarian. Many archaic wooden images were, in historic times, believed to be the work of Dædalus.

Dægsastan, Battle of. A victory gained in 603 by the Northumbrian king Æthelfrith over the Scots under Aidan, near the river Tees (?).

Daendels (dän'dels), Herman Willem. Born at Hattem, Gelderland, Netherlands, Oct. 21, 1762: died on the Gold Coast, Africa, May 2, 1818. A Dutch general, and governor-general of the Dutch East Indies 1808–11. He took part in the revolutionary agitation in the Netherlands in 1787, and was obliged to seek refuge in France. In 1793 he aided Dumouriez in the expedition against Holland, as colonel of a body of foreign volunteers; and in 1794 served with Pichegru as general of brigade. After this campaign he entered the service of the Batavian Republic as lieutenant-general, and in 1799 commanded a division in the successful resistance to the Anglo-Russian invasion. In 1806 he entered the service of the King of Holland, and was made marshal in 1807. He served also in the Russian campaign in 1812, and in 1814 was made governor of the Dutch colonies on the Gold Coast.

Daggett, Naphtali. Born at Attleborough, Mass., Sept. 8, 1727: died at New Haven, Conn., Nov. 25, 1780. An American clergyman, president pro tempore of Yale College 1766–67.

Daghestan (dä-ges-tän'). [Turk., 'mountainland.'] A province of the Caucasus, Russia, bordering on the Caspian Sea. The chief town is Derbent. It submitted to Russia in 1859, and was the scene of an insurrection 1877–78. Area, 11,332 square miles. Population (1890), 609,330.

Dagnan-Bouveret (dän-yoṅ'bōv-rā'), Pascale Adolphe Jean. Born at Paris, Jan. 7, 1852. A French painter, a pupil of Gérôme. He obtained the second grand prix de Rome in 1876. His pictures first appeared in the Salon in 1877. He has obtained several medals, one of the first class in 1880.

Dago (dā'gō). [Said to be a corruption by American and English sailors of the frequent Sp. name Diego (= E. Jack, James, ult. LL. Jacobus): applied from its frequency to the whole class of Spaniards.] Originally, one born of Spanish parents, especially in Louisiana: used as a proper name, and now extended to Spaniards, Portuguese, and Italians in general. [U. S.]

Dago (dä'gō). An island in the Baltic, near the southern entrance of the Gulf of Finland, belonging to Esthonia, Russia.

Dagobert (dag'ō-bėrt: pron. dā-gō-bār') I. Born about 602: died 638. King of the Franks, son of Clotaire II., by whom he was appointed king of Austrasia in 622, and whom he succeeded as king of the Franks in 628. He founded the abbey of St. Denis, and reduced to writing the customary laws of the barbarian tribes in his kingdom. During his reign the empire of the Franks attained its widest extent, namely, from the Weser to the Pyrenees, and from the Western Ocean to the frontiers of Bohemia.

Dagobert, Chanson du roi. [F., 'Song of King Dagobert.'] A popular French song concerning King Dagobert I. and his favorite counselor, Saint Eloi. It was in existence before the revolution of 1789. It is a satirical series of couplets sung to a hunting chorus, and has been modified to suit various political epochs. In 1814 it became immensely popular on account of the verses against Napoleon and the Russian campaign. It was forbidden by the police, but was revived on the return of the Bourbons. Every other stanza begins "Le bon roi Dagobert."

Dagon (dā'gon). A deity mentioned in the Old Testament as the national god of the Philistines, and as worshiped especially in Gaza and Ashdod (Judges xvi. 23, and 1 Sam. v.). The name is usually derived from Hebrew dag (fish), and it is assumed that Dagon was depicted as half man and half fish, and had his female counterpart in Derketo, who was worshiped in Ashkelon (Ascalon). 1 Sam. v. 4 would seem to favor this view. On the other hand, Assyro-Babylonian mythology also knows a divinity Dagon, but there he is, etymologically at least, not connected with the fish, as the Assyrian word for fish is not dag but nun: the meaning of the name Dagon has not yet been determined. At the same time the Babylonian historian Berosus gives an account of such a being, half man and half fish, and the name Oannes, who in the beginning of history emerged at intervals from the sea and taught the Babylonians civilization. This Oannes of Berosus is identified by some scholars with Ea of the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon, the god of the ocean; and is conceived as a human figure with the skin of a fish on his shoulders as a garment, a representation of which is often met on the early monuments. In Phenicia the name of the god was connected with dagan, corn, and is accordingly rendered into Greek in the fragments of Philo Byblius by σῖτος. Dagon was then considered as the god of agriculture, a function which is also emphasized in the Oannes of Berosus.

Dagonet (dag'ō-net), or Daguenet (dag'e-net), Sir. In Arthurian romances, the fool of King Arthur, who "loved him passing well and made him knight with his own hands." He was buffeted and knocked about a good deal, and is frequently alluded to by the dramatists of Shakspere's time and later.

Daguerre (dä-gār'), Louis Jacques Mandé. Born at Cormeilles, Seine-et-Oise, Nov. 18, 1789: died at Petit-Brie-sur-Marne, July 12, 1851. A French painter, and inventor (with Niépce) of the daguerreotype process. He was at first in the internal revenue service, then devoted himself to scene-painting, in which he attained celebrity, and in 1822, with Bouton, opened the Diorama in Paris (burned 1839). In the successful study of the problem of obtaining permanent pictures by the action of sunlight he was anticipated by Nicephore Niepce; who began his investigations in 1814, and communicated some of his results to Daguerre, who was then occupied with the subject, in 1826; the two worked together from 1829 until Niepce's death in 1833. Daguerre's perfected process was communicated to the Academy of Sciences by Arago, Jan. 9, 1839.

Daimio (dī'myō). [Chino-Jap., 'great name.'] The title of the chief feudal barons or territorial nobles of Japan, derived from the Chinese and anglicised from shumio ('title name'), the title given to the hatamoto, or vassals of the shogun. Though exercising independent authority in their own domains, the daimios acknowledged the mikado as the legitimate ruler of the whole country. Their power was at its height (1603–1862) the daimios gradually became subject to the shoguns, who compelled them to live in Yedo, with their families and a certain number of their followers, for six months of every year, and on their departure for their own provinces to leave their families as hostages. The number of daimios differed at different times, according to the fortunes of war and the caprice of the shoguns. Just before the abolition of the shogunate there were 255, arranged in five classes, with incomes ranging from 10,000 to 1,027,000 koku of rice per annum. In 1871 the daimios surrendered their lands and privileges to the mikado, who granted pensions proportioned to their respective revenues, and relieved them of the support of the country, their military retainers. These pensions have since been commuted into active bonds, redeemable by government within thirty years from date of issue. The title has been abolished, and that of kwazoku bestowed upon court and territorial nobles alike.

Daircell, or Faircell, or Molling. Died 696. An Irish saint. According to an Irish account of his life, he was the illegitimate son of Fiachu, a farmer at Lusachan (now Shieve Loughter), near Castle Island, Kerry. His mother, when she found herself about to give birth to a child, fled to the wilderness, where she was prevented from strangling her new-born babe only by a dove sent from heaven, which flapped its wings in her face. He was educated by St. Brendan of Clonfert, who gave him the name of Daircell ('gathering') in allusion to the manner in which the dove 'gathered' him to her with her wings. Once, when collecting alms for St. Brendan's Church, he was attacked by a band of robbers, who threatened to kill him. He made his escape by making three leaps, in which he passed over the whole of Leinster. He landed in the third inclosure of the church, whereupon he received the name of Molling (from linne, leap) of Lougher. He founded the church of Teach Molling, or Mullens, at Ross Broe (?), and is the reputed author of a Latin manuscript of the four gospels, preserved in Trinity College, Dublin.

It is bounded by Croatia-Slavonia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro on the east, and by the Adriatic on the south and west. Its surface is mountainous, and many islands line the coast. Area, 4,982 square miles. Many of its inhabitants are fishing, seafaring, ship-building, raising live stock, and the production of wine and olives. Capital, Zara. It returns a member to the Austrian Reichsrat, and has a Diet of 43 members. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. A large majority of the inhabitants are Serbo-Croats, and there are many Italians on the coast. Dalmatia formed part of the Roman province of Illyricum. It was overrun by the Goths and Avars, and in the 7th century by the Slavs. A Croatian kingdom of Dalmatia existed in the 9th century. From 1409 till recently Dalmatia fluctuated between Hungary and Venice until finally the greater part became Venetian. By the treaty of Campo-Formio in 1797 it was given to Austria. In 1805 it was ceded to France, and was retroceded to Austria in 1814. It was the scene of insurrections 1869–70, and in 1881. Area, 4,940 square miles. Population (1890), 527,426.

The earlier Illyrian war is recorded in the second book of Polybius. Appian has a special book on the Illyrian wars. In him (chap. xi.) we get our first notice of Dalmatia as such: it does not as yet occur in Polybius. There is also a shorter notice in Strabo.

Damascus (dą-mas'kus). [Heb. Dameśeq, Assyr. Dimašqa, Ar. Dimišq or Esh-Shám, F. Damas.] Formerly the capital and most important city of Syria, situated in the fertile valley of the Syrian Syris, east of the Anti-Lebanon, on the edge of the desert. On account of its beautiful fertile surroundings, its lofty position, and its richness in fresh water, Damascus has been praised in antiquity and in modern times as "the glory of the earth," "the eye of the desert," and "the pearl of the Orient." Originally a Hittite city, it became the capital of Syria, and a great part of the country was called by its name. (For its history, see Aram.) In modern times it became prominent by the massacre of Christians in 1860. It retained a certain importance through all the periods of history, and is even now the seat of the Turkish wali (governor), and has a population of between 100,000 and 150,000. In the Old Testament the name of Damascus occurs as early as the history of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15, xv. 2). After the time of David, Damascus often came into sharp collision with Israel. In the New Testament Damascus is known especially from the history of Paul (Acts ix.).

Damianus (dā-mi-ā'nus), Peter (Pietro Damiani or Damiano). Born at Ravenna, Italy, 1007: died at Faenza, Italy, Feb. 23, 1072. A Roman Catholic ecclesiastic. In 1035 he became a hermit at Fonte Avellano, near Gubbio, in Umbria, and was soon head of all the surrounding hermits and monks. He was noted for his asceticism, and established a system of self-flagellation which was later extended among the monastic orders and the Flagellants. He was also influential as a reformer, condemning simony and marriage of the clergy. He was made bishop of Ostia and cardinal in 1058, and was the adviser and censor of a number of popes, including Hildebrand (Gregory VII.). His works include epistles, sermons, lives of saints, ascetic tracts, and poems.

Damien (dā-myan'), de Veuster, Joseph. Born in Belgium, Jan. 3, 1840. A Roman Catholic missionary who devoted his life to the welfare of the lepers in the government hospital on the island of Molokai, Hawaii. He fell a victim to the disease April 15, 1889.

Damiens (dā-myan'), Robert François. Born near Arras, France, 1715: executed at Paris, March 28, 1757. A man of low character, who had been in a solicitor's and a domestic servant, who made an unsuccessful attempt upon the life of Louis XV., Jan. 5, 1757. Damiens approached the king at Versailles, as he was entering his carriage, and succeeded in stabbing him. The punishment inflicted upon him was horrible in the extreme. His right hand was burned in a slow fire: his flesh was torn with pincers and burned with melted lead; resin, wax, and oil were poured upon the wounds; and he was at last pieces by four horses.

Damietta (dam-i-et'tä). [Ar. Damiát.] A city of Lower Egypt, situated between the Damietta branch of the Nile and Lake Menzaleh 7 miles from its mouth: the ancient Tamiathis. It was besieged and taken by the Crusaders in 1218–19, and in 1249 by Louis IX. (St. Louis).

Dampier (dam'pėr), William. Born at East Coker, Somerset, England, June, 1652: died at London, March, 1715. An English freebooter, explorer, and author. His seafaring life began in 1662, and until 1691 he led a life of the wildest adventure, generally as a sailor on various piratical cruises on the western coast of America and elsewhere. During this time he circumnavigated the globe. In 1697 he published his "Voyage round the World," and this was supplemented by a second volume of travels in 1699. In 1699 he was given command of a ship in which he again went round the world, exploring the coasts of Australasia and New Guinea. He started again on a privateering cruise with two ships in 1703, but accomplished little, and his company was broken up; he reached England, after a third circumnavigation, 1707. Subsequently he was pilot of the privateer Duke, and again went round the world. Besides his travels he published a well-known "Discourse on the Winds." The following were named for him:

Dampier Archipelago. A group of small islands situated northwest of Australia, about lat. 20° 30′ S., long. 116°–117° E.

Dampier Land. A maritime district in west Australia, in lat. 17°–18° S.

He was its director, as well as of the Oratorio and Symphony societies and the Arion, until his death.

Damrosch, Walter, Born at Breslau, Prussia, Jan. 30, 1862. Conductor, son of the above. He succeeded his father as director of the Oratorio and Symphony societies.

Damsel of Brittany. A surname of Eleanor of Brittany, niece of King John of England, and sister of Arthur, count of Brittany. She was imprisoned by John, and died 1241.

D'Amville (dam'vil). The Atheist in Cyril Tourneur's play "The Atheist's Tragedy."

Dan (dan). [Heb., 'judge.'] 1. A son of Jacob by Bilhah. Gen. xxx. 6.—2. A Hebrew tribe. The portion allotted to the Danites, as described in Josh. xix., was the small but fertile hilly tract west of Benjamin and northwest of Judah to the sea, including the cities of Japho, Ekron, Gathrimmon, etc. But though the tribe of Dan was originally one of the strongest numerically, counting 62,000 to 64,000, it was not equal to the task of expelling the Ammonites, and later the Philistines, from that territory, and only for a time prevailed with the help of Ephraim and Judah. In consequence of this, part of the tribe migrated to the extreme north of the country, and conquered the city of Laish, henceforth called Dan (see below). That part which remained in the south, from which the hero Samson descended, disappeared from history, and seems to have been absorbed by the tribe of Judah.

3. The city formerly called Laish, and named Dan after its capture by the Danites. It is situated on the slopes of Hermon, not far from the modern Banias still called Tell-el-Kadi, 'hill of the Judge' (Kadi is often mentioned in the Old Testament as the most northern landmark of Palestine, in the formula 'from Dan to Beersheba.' It contained a sanctuary with an image the exact nature of which is not known. At the division of the kingdom Jeroboam put up there one of the "calves." It is first mentioned in Gen. xiv. 14 as the place at which Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and his four allies were overthrown and defeated by Abraham. The occurrence in this account of the name which was given to the place many centuries later is variously explained. If the Dan of Gen. xiv. is identical with that of Judges xviii. and if the account of Gen. xiv. is authentic, the name Dan may have been later inserted in the MS. for Laish, when the latter was superseded by the former.

Dan. A river of Virginia and North Carolina which unites with the Staunton at Clarksville, Virginia, to form the Roanoke. Length, about 200 miles.

Dana (dā′nä), Charles Anderson. Born at Hinsdale, N. H., Aug. 8, 1819. An American journalist and man of letters. He studied at Harvard 1804–07 (expelled in the latter year); was admitted to the bar in 1811; was associate editor of the "North American Review" 1813–20; and conducted the serial "The Idle Man" 1821–22. He published "Buccaneer, and Other Poems" (1827), etc., and wrote ten lectures on the characters of Shakspere and delivered them in 1839–40. He published his collected works in prose and verse in 1850.

Dana, Richard Henry. Born at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 1, 1815: died at Rome, Italy, Jan. 7, 1882. An American jurist, politician, and author, son of R. H. Dana (1787–1879). In 1834 he shipped before the mast for a voyage on the Pacific to restore his health. From this voyage came "Two Years Before the Mast" (1840). He was one of the founders of the Free-Soil party 1848. Among his other works are "True Women's Friend" (1841), and an edition of Wheaton's "Elements of International Law" (1866).

Dana, Samuel Luther. Born at Amherst, N. H., July 11, 1795: died at Lowell, Mass., March 11, 1868. An American chemist and agricultural writer. He was employed as chemist to the Merrimac Print Works at Lowell upward of thirty years, and invented a new method of bleaching cotton, which was generally adopted.

Danaë (dăn′ā-ē). [Gr. Δανάη.] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Acrisius of Argos, and mother of Perseus by Zeus, who visited her, while she was shut up in a brazen tower by her father, in the form of a shower of gold. She was shut up with her child in a chest, thrown into the sea, and carried by the waves to the island of Seriphos. From various difficulties she was in the end rescued by Perseus and brought back to Greece. Many of the representations of her in art are famous. Among them are: (a) A painting by Rembrandt in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. Danaë lies, undraped, on a bed covered with green silk; her unloosed girdle has fallen to the floor. An old woman is in attendance behind the curtains. (b) A painting by Correggio, in the Palazzo Borghese, Rome. She reclines smiling on her couch, while Cupid before her holds out a fold of the drapery over her knees to catch the golden shower. (c) A masterpiece of Titian in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. Danaë reclines on a couch while the golden shower falls upon her. (d) A painting by Titian, in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. Danaë lies, nude, on a cushioned couch; the golden rain falls from a cloud over her, in which the face and hand of Jupiter appear. An old woman seeks to catch some of the shower in a dish.

Dance of Death, Dance of Macaber (ma-kā′bėr). [F. Danse Macabre, L. Chorea Machabæorum.] Originally, a kind of morality or allegorical representation intended to remind the living of the power of death. It originated in the 14th century in Germany, and consisted of dialogues between Death and a number of typical followers, which were acted in or near churches by the religious orders. Soon after it was repeated in France. It became extraordinarily popular, and was treated in every possible way, in pictures, bas-reliefs, tapestry, etc. Death is made grotesque and a sort of "horrid Harlequin," a skeleton dancer or musician playing or dancing, leading all mankind. A dramatic poem which grew out of this was imitated in Spain in 1400 as "La Danza General de los Muertos." In 1425 the French, having illustrated each verse, had the whole series painted on the wall of the churchyard of the Monastery of the Innocents, where they acted the drama. In 1430 the poem and pictures were produced in London, and not long after at Salisbury (1460). Worthy Hall in Gloucestershire, and other places. In Germany it attained its greatest popularity. The drama was acted usually about the middle of 16th century, when the pictures became the main point of interest. There is a picture of this kind in the Marienkirche at Lubeck, and one on the cloister wall of Klingenthal, a convent at Basel, both of the 14th century: the latter disappeared in 1805. One in the Campo Santo at Pisa is ascribed to Orcagna. In the reign of Henry VI. a professional Dance of Death was painted around the cloisters of old St. Paul's in London. Holbein has left fifty-three sketches for engraving, the originals of which are in St. Petersburg. These he called "Imagines Mortis"; they are, however, independent, and do not represent a dance. Lydgate wrote a metrical translation of the poem for the chapter of St. Paul's, to be placed under the pictures in the cloister. Various explanations of the name Macaber or Macabre have been given.

> The name "Macabre" probably arose from the association of this subject with a painting that illustrated a thirteenth-century legend of the lesson given by certain hideous spectres of Death to three noble youths when hunting in a forest. They afterwards arrived at the cell of St. Macarius, an Egyptian anchorite, who was shown in a painting by Andrew Orgagna pre-cenling them with one hand a label of admonition on the vainglory of life, and with the other hand pointing to three open coffins. In one coffin is a skeleton, in one a king.

Dandin (doṅ-dań′), Perrin. A name given to an ignorant and preposterous judge in Racine's "Les plaideurs" and in La Fontaine's "Fables," taken from Rabelais's "Perrin Dandin."

Dandolo (dän′dō-lō), Andrea. Born 1310: died Oct. 7, 1354. Doge of Venice 1343–54. He joined in 1343 the Crusade proclaimed by Clement VI. against the Turks, which ended in a peace advantageous to Venice in 1346. He waged almost continuous war with Genoa 1348–1354. He wrote "Chronicon Venetum," a Latin chronicle of Venice, which terminates with the year 1338.

Dandolo, Enrico. Born at Venice about 1108: died at Constantinople, June 1, 1205. Doge of Venice 1192–1205. He was the leader of the Venetians and Crusaders in the capture of Constantinople 1203 and 1204. He went as ambassador to the Byzantine court in 1173, and was blinded by order of the emperor Manuel.

Dandolo, Count Vincenzo. Born at Venice, Oct. 26, 1758: died there, Dec. 13, 1819. An Italian chemist and economist. He wrote "Fondamenti della fisico-chimica" (1796), "Discorsi sulla pastorizia, etc." (1806), etc.

Dane (dān). Nathan. Born at Ipswich, Mass., Dec. 27, 1752: died at Beverley, Mass., Feb. 15, 1835. An American jurist. He drafted the ordinance relating to the government of the territory northwest of Ohio 1786–87, and published "Abridgment and Digest of American Law" (1823–29).

Danelagh, or Danelaw (dān′lā). [Also Danelagh, Danelage, etc., after ME. or ML. transcriptions of the AS.; AS. Dene lage, law of the Danes: Deen, gen. of Dene, the Danes; lagu, law.] That part of England where the Danish influence was paramount during the 9th and 10th centuries. It corresponded to the modern shires York, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, Rutland, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, Buckingham, Bedford, and Herts.

Danes (dānz). [From ME. Dane (after ML. Dani, etc.), Dene, from AS. Dene, pl., = D. Deen = G. Däne, etc., = Icel. Danir, pl., = Dan. Dane, pl. Daner, also Dan-sk = Sw. Dan-sk; first in LL. Dani, pl.; ult. origin unknown.] The natives of Denmark. They were first described early in the 9th century as the warlike people of the Cimbrian peninsula, in territory formerly occupied by the Heruli, whither, according to Jordanes, they had come from scandinavia. The Old Danish dialect is preserved in numerous runic inscriptions, the oldest of which date from the Viking age (700–1050), and in literature from the 13th century. The principal dialects: gothic are distinguished, which are typically represented by the dialects of Scania in southern Sweden, Zealand, and Jutland. The Zealand dialect became the literary form at about the time of the Reformation, from which period modern Danish dates.

Danewerk (dān′e-verk), Dan. Dannevirke. ['Danes' work.] An ancient intrenchment or wall erected by King Gottfried in the 9th century as a protection of Denmark against invasion from the south. It extended from the Schlei to the Treene. It was strengthened in the 10th century and later, and was captured from the Danes by the Prussians April 5, 1848.

Dangeau (doṅ-zhō′), Philippe de Courcillon, Marquis de. A French soldier, aide-de-camp to Louis XIV. whom he attended in all his campaigns. He wrote a voluminous journal, covering the period from 1684 to 1720, and giving in minute detail the occurrences at the court and palace of the great Louis.

Dangle (dang′gl). An amateur critic, in Sheridan's farce "The Critic," whose peculiarities are agreeably described by his wife in the first scene: supposed to be a satire on Thomas Vaughan, a playwright.

> And what have you to do with the theatre, Mr. Dangle? Why should you affect the character of a critic? I have no patience with such fops as you! Haven't you made the jest of all your acquaintance by your interference in matters where you have no business? Are not you called a theatrical quidnunc, and a mock Maecenas to second-hand authors? Sheridan, The Critic, i.

Danican (dä-nē-koṅ′), François André, usually known as Philidor. Born at Dreux, France, Sept. 7, 1726: died at London, Aug. 31, 1795. A noted French chess-player and musical composer, author of "Analyse du jeu des échecs" (1777).

Daniel (dan′yel). [Heb., 'my judge is God.'] One of the prophets of the Old Testament. According to the books which bear his name, he (probably being of royal or noble descent) was carried off captive to Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim (605 B. C.), and with three other Israelitish youths of noble blood, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, was instructed in the language and learning of the Babylonians and educated for the king's service. They refrained from defiling themselves by partaking of the food of the king. Daniel was especially gifted with "understanding in all visions and dreams," and successfully exercised this gift by interpreting Nebuchadnezzar's dream of Nebuchadnezzar, and the mysterious writing on the wall which disturbed the revelry of Belshazzar (Dan. v. 5). At the accession of Darius he was made "one of the three presidents" of the empire. He was divinely delivered from the lions' den into which he was thrown for refusing to obey a decree of the king forbidding any one to ask a petition of God or man for thirty days except the king. He was still prosperous under Cyrus. In the third year of Cyrus he saw the vision on the bank of the Tigris, and this is the last notice about him in the Old Testament. He is referred to by Ezekiel as a pattern of righteousness and wisdom. In addition to his Hebrew name, a Babylonian one, Belteshazzar (which see), was given him. Legends about him grew up, as in the apocryphal additions to the biblical book which bears his name, "Bel and the Dragon," the story of Susanna and Daniel, etc. According to Mohammedan tradition, Daniel returned to Palestine, where he held the government of Syria, and finally died at Susa, where his tomb is still shown, and is visited by crowds of pilgrims.

Daniel, Book of. A book which in the English Bible, as in all other translations, follows Ezekiel as the fourth of the greater prophets, while in the original Hebrew Bible it has its place in the third division of the Canon, the Hagiographa. It is generally divided into two parts. The first, chapters i.–vi., contains historical incidents; the second, chapters vii.–xii., visions. Chapters ii.,iv.–vii., inclusive, are written in Aramaic; the rest in Hebrew. The authenticity and historical character of the book were early called in question. Porphyry, in his discourses against the Christians, and most modern critics relegate the book in its present shape, on historical and linguistic grounds, to the period of the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes (about 167 B. C.). The writer exhibits a familiarity with the history of that period, while his historical references to the time in which Daniel is supposed to have lived are vague and in many instances incorrect: as, for instance, that Nebuchadnezzar was the father of Belshazzar, that the latter was the last Babylonian king, and that Darius, and not Cyrus, was the successor of Nabonidus in the rule over Babylonia. The language of the book contains numerous Persian and Greek words which point to a time when these empires had long been established. The object of the author may have been to encourage his people to constancy and faithfulness in the desperate struggle for their country and faith, showing them how the constancy and fidelity of Daniel and his three companions were rewarded, and revealing to them the glorious future which is to follow their present sufferings. This, however, does not exclude a historical basis of the narratives contained in the book; and it is not impossible that a Daniel similar to the one described in the book not only existed during the exile, but that also some written materials were extant from him, which the author of the Canonical Daniel put together with traditions, into a literary form, with a special view to the circumstances of his own time.

Daniel (dăn-yel'), Arnaud. See the extract.

> Of the troubadours themselves none is mentioned with higher praise than Arnaut Daniel. Petrarch calls him gran maestro d'amore, the "great master of love, whose novel and beautiful style still (i. e. about the middle of the fourteenth century) does honor to his country"; and Dante in his philosophical and metrical treatise "De vulgari eloquio" declares himself indebted to Arnaut for the structure of several of his stanzas. The "sestina," for instance, a poem of six verses in which the final words of the first stanza appear in inverted order in all the others, is an invention of this troubadour adopted by Dante and Petrarch, and, most likely through the medium of French models, by Sir Philip Sidney. Ticknor, Troubadours, &c.

Daniel, Gabriel. Born at Rouen, France, Feb. 8, 1649; died at Paris, June 23, 1728. A French Jesuit historian and theologian, author of a famous "Histoire de France" (1713), etc.

Dantas (dän'tȧs). Manuel Pinto de Souza. Born in Bahia about 1825. A Brazilian politician of the liberal party. He was senator from 1879, minister of justice in 1880, and of the interior in 1882, and prime minister from June 6 to May 7, 1885. He brought forward a bill for emancipation, which, though lost at the time, led to complete abolition of slavery three years later.

Dante (dan'te; It. pron. dän'te) (originally Durante) Alighieri. Born at Florence in May, 1265; died at Ravenna, Italy, Sept. 14, 1321. A celebrated Italian poet. His father, Alighiero degli Alighieri, was of an ancient family. (The name is also spelled Aldigeri, Alaghieri, Aligeri, Aleghieri.) He was a moderate man and a member of the Guelph party. After its defeat at the battle of Montaperti, he went into exile. Dante, as he was called after the Florentine fashion, was educated in the best schools of Florence. In the ninth year of his age he first saw Beatrice Portinari, then only eight years old, who inspired him with that romantic passion which we think the foremost and platonic love which he narrates in the "Vita Nuova" and the "Divina Commedia." Beatrice was married in 1287 to Messer Simone de' Bardi, and died shortly after, at the age of twenty-four. Dante relates no disappointment at her marriage, and seems to have had no desire for any intimate relation with her. About two years after her death he married Gemma Donati. He became passionately absorbed in the love of country, and at the age of twenty-four fought on the side of the Guelphs at the battle of Campaldino. He was intrusted with several foreign missions, and became an important factor in the Florentine government. His political ideas changed gradually, and from being an ardent Guelph and Florentine he became "the first Italian," as has been said, conceived a plan of general organization for the advancement of Italy; and endeavored to reconcile the Guelphs and Ghibellines. In 1295 he took his seat among the Priori, one of the priors of Florence. The struggles and riots of the Bianchi and Neri resulted in the destruction of half of Florence, being charged and punished as contumacious in his absence at Rome, to which city the Bianchi had sent him on an embassy. The Neri succeeded in establishing a government of their own, and pronounced sentence of temporary banishment against Dante in 1302. He succeeded in obtaining aid from various courts, especially from Della Scala, lord of Verona, his friend, who was the chief of the Ghibellines. In 1303 an unsuccessful attempt was made to take possession of Florence, and, humiliated by his exile and failures, Dante withdrew from a public career, and passed the rest of his life in wandering from one city to another, watching, and endeavoring to guide, the course of events from various retreats. Finally, in 1320, he went to Ravenna, and on his return from a mission to Venice fell ill, and, being worn out by failure and disappointment, died at the age of fifty-six years. He spent the years from 1304 to 1306 in study, and all his works except the "Vita Nuova" were written in solitary exile. His chief work is the "Divina Commedia" (which see). The "Vita Nuova" is practically the history of his love for Beatrice. It was probably published in 1307. The "Convito," or Banquet, is almost a continuation of the "Vita Nuova." It gives much information about his life, and throws light on the "Divina Commedia." These were parts in Italian. "De vulgari eloquio sive thismate" is a Latin treatise on the Italian language or vulgar idiom. It was begun in 1304, and is alluded to in the "Convito." The monarchia, a treatise containing Dante's creed as a Ghibelline, was written between 1310 and 1314. There is a famous portrait of the poet as a young man, by Giotto, on the wall of the Bargello in Florence. It was injured by time and vandalism, and has been too much restored; fortunately, a tracing of it was made before this by an Englishman, and this tracing has been published by the Arundel Society. It and a death-mask are the only authentic likenesses of Dante.

> There are fair grounds for believing that he [Dante] himself visited Oxford. Villani states that Dante, who was one of his contemporaries and neighbors at Florence, "went to the University (studio) at Bologna and then at Paris, and in other parts of the world." Boccaccio, a little later in point of time, mentions incidentally that Dante visited England as well as France; and Giovanni da Serravalle, Bishop of Fermo, writing in 1416, states positively that Dante studied the liberal arts at Padua and Bologna, and theology at Oxford and Paris. Some indirect evidence in support of this may be found in the "Divina Commedia," which contains a description of the coast of Flanders, an allusion to Westminster Abbey, and several scattered notices of English affairs. A close resemblance has also been traced between some of Dante's opinions and those of Roger Bacon, the great English philosopher. The date of Dante's undoubted sojourn at Paris must be placed either between the years 1287 and 1289, or between 1308 and 1314. Lyte, Oxford, p. 89.

Dantès (doṅ-tès'). Edmond. The Count of Monte Cristo, in Dumas's novel of that name. He appears, for the furtherance of his revenge, as Lord Wilmore and the Abbé Busoni.

Danti (dan'tē), Vincenzo. Born at Perugia: died May 24, 1576. An Italian goldsmith, sculptor, military architect, and poet. He was the "Decapitation of St. John" over the door of the baptistery at Florence, and the statue of Pope Julius III. at Perugia.

Danton (doṅ-toṅ'). Georges Jacques. Born at Arcis-sur-Aube, France, Oct. 28, 1759: guillotined at Paris, April 5, 1794. A celebrated French revolutionist. He was the leader of the attack on the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792; was minister of justice in Aug.–Sept., 1792; fomented the September massacres; moved the formation of the Revolutionary tribunal March, 1793, and was a member of the Committee of Public safety in April–Sept., 1793. He overthrew Hébert and his party with the aid of Robespierre, who was in turn overthrown by the latter. He was an orator of great power.

Dan Tucker (dan tuk'ėr). A negro song with the refrain "Out o' de way, ole Dan Tucker"; said to refer to Captain Daniel Tucker of Virginia, second governor of Bermuda.

Dantzic, or Dantsic (dant'sik). [G. Danzig, Pol. Gdansk, L. Gedanum.] A seaport, capital of the province of West Prussia, Prussia, situated on the Vistula 3 miles from its mouth, and on the Motlau and Radaune, in lat. 54° 21′ N., long. 18° 39′ E. It contains the Altstadt, Rechtstadt, Vorstadt, Niederstadt, Langgarten, and Speicherstadt, the Island, and is a strong fortress. It is one of the principal ports of Germany, and next to Odessa has the largest grain-trade in Europe. Its old buildings include the Rathhaus, the Exchange (Artushof or Junkerhof), the Church of St. Mary, and a Franciscan monastery (with a museum). It was the capital of Pomerelia, or Pomerelien, until the town is mentioned as early as 997. It passed to the Teutonic Order about 1295–96, and for a time was a Hanseatic city. It came under the supremacy of Poland in 1466, but retained a large measure of independence. After the second partition of Poland it passed to Prussia in 1793. It was besieged and taken by the French under Lefebvre in 1807; was made a commonwealth in 1807; was besieged by the Allies in 1813, and taken (1814) after an eleven months' siege. It was restored to Prussia in 1814. Population (1890), commune, 150,338.

Danube (dan'ūb). [G. Donau, Hung. Duna, L. Danubius, later Danubius, Gr. Δανούβιος.] The largest river of Europe next to the Volga, formed by the union of the Breg and Brigach at Donaueschingen in southern Baden: the Roman Danubius, or (in its lower course) Ister. It flows through Wurtemberg, Bavaria, and Austria-Hungary; separates Austria-Hungary from Turkey in the north from Servia and Bulgaria on the south; and empties into the Black Sea by three principal mouths, about lat. 45° 25′ N. Navigable for 1,750 miles. Its tributaries are, on the right bank, the Iller, Lech, Isar, Inn, Enns, Raab, Drave, Save, Morava, and Timok; on the left bank, the Altmühl, Naab, Regen, Morau, Leitha, Theiss, Temes, Schyl, Aluta, Arjish, Yalomnitza, Sereth, and Pruth. Area of basin, about 300,000 square miles. Length, 1,770 miles.

Danube Navigation Commission, International. A commission appointed by the Treaty of Paris in 1856, and which still continues. It has great authority over the Danube mouths, in constructing engineering works, making local regulations, etc., and to a less extent over the Danube as far up as the Iron Gates.

Danzig. See Dantzic.

Daphnæ (daf'nē) (town). See Daphne, 2.

Daphne (daf'nē), [Gr. Δάφνη the laurel.] 1. In Greek mythology, a nymph, daughter of the river-god Peneus, or, in other accounts, of Ladon, an Arcadian. Her lover Leucippus pursued her in woman's clothing, and was killed by the nymphs at the instigation of Apollo. When the god in turn pursued her, she entreated that she might be transformed into the bay-tree, and he granted her petition.

2. The first Italian opera, as distinguished from a musical drama. It was produced by the society of the Alterati in Florence, in a private house, in 1597. The music was by Giulio Caccini and Jacopo Peri (who both invented recitative), the words by Ottavio Rinuccini. Opitz made a German translation of the text, and Heinrich Schütz wrote new music for it. This was the first German opera, and was produced April 13, 1627, at Torgau, at the court of the elector John George I.

3. An asteroid (No. 41) discovered by Goldschmidt at Paris, May 22, 1856.

Daphne, 1. In ancient geography, a famous grove and sanctuary of Apollo, situated about 5 miles southwest of Antioch, Syria. It was established by Seleucus Nicator.—2. A town in ancient Egypt, about 25 miles from Pelusium: the Tahpenes of the Bible, and the modern Tel Defenneh. Its site has recently been explored. Also Daphnæ.

Daphne, Convent of. See Athens (Greece).

Daphnis (daf'nis), [Gr. Δάφνις.] 1. In Greek mythology, a shepherd, son of Mercury and a Sicilian nymph. He was protected by Diana, and loved the chase. Pan gave him lessons in singing and on the flute, and the Muses endowed him with a love of poetry, and he is said to have originated bucolic poetry. He was turned into a stone according to one legend; according to another his eyes were torn out by a nymph for his infidelity to her, and he threw himself in despair into the sea. In ancient pastoral poetry his name was frequently given to shepherds.

2. A gentle shepherd in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Faithful Shepherdess."—3. An idyl by Gesner (1756).

Daphnis and Chloe (klō'ē). A Greek pastoral romance attributed to Longus (4th or 5th century A. D.), a Greek sophist. It recounts the loves and pastoral life of Daphnis, foster-son of Lamon, a goatherd, and Chloe, foster-daughter of Dryas, a shepherd. The manuscript of Methymna, taken to Florence, does not name the author. It is known principally through the French version of Amyot (1559), completed by Courier. It has been translated and imitated in all European languages. Tasso's "Aminta," Montemayor's "Diana," d'Urfé's "Sireine," St. Pierre's "Paul and Virginia," and Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd" are founded on it.

Da Ponte (dä pon'te), Lorenzo. Born at Ceneda, near Venice, March 10, 1749: died at New York, Aug. 17, 1838. An Italian librettist and author. He wrote the words to Mozart's "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni."

Dapper (dap'ėr). In Ben Jonson's comedy "The Alchemist," a greedy and credulous lawyer's clerk who desires a "fly" (a spirit or familiar) of the Alchemist to enable him to cheat at horse-races by giving him prior information.

Dapperwit. A vain, foolish, and boastful rake in Wycherley's "Love in a Wood."

Dappes (dap). Vallée des. A small valley in the Jura, canton of Vaud, Switzerland. It was a subject of dispute between France and Switzerland 1815–62.

Dapple (dap'l). The name of Sancho Panza's ass in Cervantes's romance "Don Quixote."

Darab (dä'räb), or Darabgherd (dä-räb-gerd'), or Darabjird (dä-räb-jėrd'). A city in the province of Farsistan, Persia, in lat. 28° 55′ N., long. 54° 25′ E. It is sometimes identified with the ancient Pasargadæ.

Daras (dā'ras). An ancient town of Mesopotamia, situated near Nisibis. It was a frontier post of the Eastern Empire against Persia in the 6th century A. D.

Darbhangah (dä-bäng'gä), or Durbunga (durbun'gä). 1. A district in Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 26° N., long. 86° E. Area, 3,335 square miles. Population (1881), 2,633,447.—2. The capital of the above district. Population (1891), 75,561.

Dardanelles (där-da-nelz'). A strait connecting the Sea of Marmora with the Ægean Sea, and separating the peninsula of Gallipoli from Asia Minor: the ancient Hellespont. It is defended by castles at Tchanak-Kalessi (known as the Castle of Asia: see extract below), Kilid-Bahr (known as the Castle of Europe), and at the Sigean entrance. It was crossed by Xerxes in 480 B. C., and by Alexander the Great in 334 B. C. The passage was forced by the British fleet under Admiral Duckworth in 1807. It was closed against foreign men-of-war by treaty in 1841, 1856, and 1871. It was passed by a British fleet in Feb., 1878, to protect Constantinople from the Russians. In 1891 an agreement between Russia and the Porte was reached, by which the ships of the so-called volunteer fleet of Russia, bearing the flag of the merchant marine, are allowed free passage of the Dardanelles. Also, they carry convict, soldiers, and troops, for this fact must be given to the Porte. Length, about 45 miles. Average width, 3 to 4 miles.

> About 1½ m. below the western point of that bay [Maito Dhaghi] are the famous castles of the Dardanelles. The castles, Chanak-kalesi, the earthenware castle, from a celebrated manufacture, or Sultanieh-kalesi, on the Asiatic side (known as the Castle of Asia), and Khilid-bahri, or Kalidd-bahr (the key to the lock of the sea), on the European shore (known as the Castle of Europe), are called by the Turks Boghaz-hissarleri, and by the Franks the Old Castles of Anatolia and Roumelia. Chanak-kalesi, commonly called Dardanelles, is a town of 2,000 houses, on a flat point opposite the European fort. Khilid-bahri is built on the side of a projecting hill, and its castle is of less importance than that of Chanak-kalesi. The equipment of the forts both on the European and Asiatic sides has recently been entirely reorganized. On the Asiatic side the fort of Sultanieh Bia has been armed with Krupp guns, with will command a large section of the Straits both above and below the town. Some distance below the town a 40-ton Krupp gun has been mounted behind earthworks. Above the town are also batteries, one of which on the Najara Bournou point has a heavy Krupp gun. On the European side the fort of Khilid-bahri, situated at the foot of a steep hill, has 15 large Krupp guns, and both above and below it are newly-constructed earthworks heavily armed. The barrow of Achilles, opposite Cynossema, on the Asiatic coast erected a trophy after their victory towards the end of the Peloponnesian war (Thucydides, viii.), is, or was, close to the European castle.

Darius (da-rī'us) I. [Gr. Δαρεῖος; in the Old Testament Daryaresh; in the cuneiform inscriptions Daryavush or Daryamush; OPers. Dārayavush.] Son of Hystaspes, and fifth in the descent from Achæmenes. He succeeded Cambyses on the Persian throne 521–486, after defeating the Magian Gaumata, who had claimed to be Smerdis (Bardiya), brother of Cambyses. A record of his reign is given by himself in the long trilingual inscriptions of Behistun (which see). Besides the revolt in Persis itself, caused by the impostor Gaumata, he had to suppress two uprisings in Babylonia, led by Nidintu-Bel and Arachu, who gave themselves out for Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabonidus: in consequence of these uprisings he caused the fortifications of Babylon to be torn down. The other countries also fell away in turn, but at last were brought to submission, after restoring order in the east he turned his attention to reorganization and reforms of the administration. He divided the whole land into twenty satrapies, introduced regular taxation and uniformity of coinage, constructed roads, and founded a kind of postal system by placing stations and relays with saddled horses at regular intervals on the road between Susa and Sardis. To the capitals Susa in Elam, Ecbatana in Media, and Babylon, he added Persepolis in Persia proper, which was destroyed by Alexander the Great, but of which imposing ruins have survived. On account of his attention to trade and industry he was called "the Huckster." His expedition over the Bosporus and Danube into Scythia was unsuccessful. Toward the East he extended his supremacy to the Indus, and compelled North Africa to pay him tribute. Under him began also the great struggle between Persia and Greece (battle of Marathon in 490). His tomb is hewn in the rock at a place called Nakkshi-Kustem, near Persepolis, and is adorned with sculptures and inscriptions complementing those of Behistun. Darius I. is referred to in the Old Testament in connection with the building of the temple of Zerubbabel. In the second year of his reign he allowed the resumption of the building, and in the sixth it was completed (Ezra. vi. 15).

Dartmouth College, Case of. In the history of American jurisprudence, a case which derives great importance from its bearing on the law of corporations. It originated in a dispute between the president and trustees of Dartmouth College. The former, having been removed from office by the latter, appealed to the legislature of New Hampshire, which passed a bill amending the charter of the college, whereby a new corporation was created under the title of Dartmouth University, a majority of the trustees being vested in the new corporation. The college trustees brought action in the Court of Common Pleas in 1815 to prevent the change. The case came by appeal before the supreme court of the United States, which in 1819 rendered a decision in favor of the trustees. The decision held that a charter is a contract between the state and the corporation created by the charter, and that as the State is prohibited by the Constitution in its passing any laws impairing the obligations of contracts, charters are unalterable except by consent of the corporations created by them. The plaintiffs were represented by Daniel Webster.

Davenant, or D'Avenant, Sir William. Born at Oxford, England, Feb., 1605; died at London, April 17, 1668. An English poet and dramatist. Oldys is chiefly responsible for the story that Davenant was the son of Shakspere, which seems to rest mainly on the fact that his father used the inn of John Davenant (the father of William) at Oxford on his journeys to and from Warwickshire. About 1629 Davenant became poet laureate. Duchess of Richmond, and then of Duke Charlotte, Lord Brooke. In 1628, after the murder of Greville, he began to write plays, etc. In 1638 he was made poet laureate. About this time he had a severe illness which resulted in the loss of his nose, a fact frequently adverted to by the witty writers of the time. He was manager of Drury Lane Theatre for a time, but, becoming implicated in various intrigues of the civil war, he fled to France. Returning in 1643, he was knighted at the siege of Gloucester. He was imprisoned for two years in the Tower and Cowes castle, and subjected to hardships. While there he published "Gondibert" (1651). This epic poem consisted of fifteen hundred four-line stanzas. After the Restoration he was in favor at court, and continued to write for the stage. His plays are "The Siege of Rhodes" (published in 1629, "The Cruel Brother" (1630), "The Just Italian" (1630), "The Wits" (1636), "The Unfortunate Lovers" (1638), "The Siege of Rhodes" (1656), "Love and Honor" (1649), "Law against Lovers" (played in 1662), "The Rivals" (played in 1664), etc. He produced alterations of "The Tempest" (with Dryden, 1667) and of "Macbeth" (printed 1673) and "Julius Cæsar."

David (dā'vid). [Heb., 'beloved one.'] The second king of Israel, 1055–1015 B. C.: born at Bethlehem, as the seventh and youngest son of Jesse of the tribe of Judah. His pedigree is found in Ruth iv. His early youth was spent as shepherd of his father's flocks, where he had opportunity to develop his musical talent and to exercise his cutrage. After his disagreement with Saul, the prophet Samuel secretly anointed him king of Israel. He must then have been about eighteen years old. According to one account, he first came into contact with Saul when he was drawn to the court as a musician to drive away by his music the melancholy humor ("evil spirit") of the king, who then made him his armor-bearer; according to another (1 Sam. xvii.), Saul came to know him after he killed the giant Goliath and decided the battle between the Israelites and the Philistines. In 2 Sam. xxi. 19 it is stated that Goliath was killed by Elhanan; Jerome (Quaest. Hebr. ad loc.) makes Elhanan the same as David, similarly to Sayce who assumes that Elhanan was David's first name. Wellhausen, Stade, and others consider the whole account of this contest as legendary. His successes and the praises accorded to him by the people aroused the suspicion and the jealousy of Saul (whose daughter Michal he married), which subsequently turned into deadly hatred, so that he was often in jeopardy of his life. He first sought refuge with Samuel, then with the priests in Nob, which resulted in their massacre by Saul, and was finally driven to seek safety with the enemies of his people, the Philistines. There rallied around him "men who were in distress, in debt, and discontented." At the head of these freebooters or outlaws he undertook many expeditions and fought many skirmishes, which made him increasingly popular with the people. All this time he was pursued by Saul, whose mind became more and more darkened since the king came into his power, but because of his awe of the "anointed of the Lord" he did not avail himself of these opportunities (1 Sam. xxiv. 1 ff., xxvi. 7 ff.). He was compelled to become the vassal of the Philistine king Achish of Gath, who gave him for his support Ziklag on the frontier of Philistia. From here he undertook expeditions against the nomadic tribes of the border, while Achish believed that they were directed against Israel (1 Sam. xxvii.) The Philistines gathered a large army against Israel. In the battle of Gilboa, which ensued, Saul and his host lost their lives. To David, who was then about thirty years old, the crown now fell. For seven and a half years his reign was limited to his native tribe of Judah, whose capital was Hebron, while the other tribes were under the scepter of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, residing in Mahanaim, east of the Jordan. Ishbosheth, however, was murdered, and all the tribes recognized David as king over the whole land, and he reigned for thirty-three years. He removed his residence from Hebron to Jerusalem, which he took from the Jebusites, and there established himself in the "city of David," the oldest quarter of Jerusalem, on Mount Zion. Here also the temporary sanctuary was put up (2 Sam. vi.), which made the city the political and religious center of the nation, and gave to David's reign a genuine royal character. Through a series of successful wars against the Philistines, Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Syrians, Amalekites, etc., and by the introduction of a permanent administration and organization of court and army, he became the real founder of the monarchical government of Israel. The constitution of the Israelitish state, based on a military organization was a national one. Each tribe sent a contingent of men (over twenty years of age) to the national army, which at once was increased to number 288,000, David's nephew. The body-guard was formed, it seems, of foreigners, the Cherethites and Pelethites (supposed to be Philistines). The nucleus of the army consisted of the band of heroes (gibborim) who rallied about David while he was still an exile. The king presided over judicial cases, and was surrounded by a regular staff of military and administrative counselors and officers. David was also the actual founder of a sanctifying, divine worship, refining and enriching it by the influence of music and psalmody. The last period of his reign was much darkened by national misfortunes and domestic rebellions—the rebellion of his son Absalom, the uprising of Sheba ben Bishri, a drought and famine lasting three years, and a pestilence induced by the counting of the people. Even in his last days, when he was prostrated with the infirmities of age, his son Adonijah endeavored to secure the succession to which David had appointed Solomon. This rebellion, however, like all the others, was successfully repressed, and David died peacefully at the age of seventy. He became the ideal king of Israel, the pattern and standard by which all succeeding rulers were measured, the prototype of the last perfect ruler, the Messiah, who is sometimes simply called David. As regards the Psalms ascribed to him, it is needless him the authorship of many psalms bearing in the biblical Book of Psalms the superscription "of David." But there is no reason for distrusting the ancient record from this kind of Hebrew poetry. The probability is that not only did the psalm-poetry develop and flourish under his favor, but that he himself composed many hymns.

David, or Dewi, Saint. Died in 601. The patron saint of Wales. He was bishop of Menevia (afterward called St. David's), where he founded a monastery. Dead Souls. A novel by Gogol, which appeared in 1841. He began to write it in 1837, and left it unfinished, destroying the concluding portions in a fit of religious mania. A certain Dr. Zakharchenko, of Kieff, published in 1857 a continuation of it. An English translation, entitled "Tchitchikoff's Journeys, or Dead Souls," by Isabel F. Hapgood, was published in New York in 1886.

At the time of serfdom a Russian proprietor's fortune was not valued according to the extent of his lands, but according to the number of male serfs which were held upon them. "Souls" were called "souls." . . . The proprietor paid the capitation tax for all the souls on his domain; but as the census was rarely taken it happened that he had long to pay for dead serfs, until a new official revision struck them out from the register of the living. It is easy to see what these dead souls must have cost a proprietor whose lands had been visited by famine, . . . and his interest in getting rid of them will be manifest. What seems more surprising is that there were people ready to purchase them.

Tchitchikoff, the hero of the book, an ambitious and civilminded rascal, made this proposition to himself: "I will visit the most remote corners of Russia, and ask the good people he declared from the number on their lists every serf who has died since the last census was taken. This will be only too glad, as it will be to their interest to yield up to me a fictitious property, and get rid of paying the tax upon it. I shall have my purchase regularly drawn up, and no tribunal will imagine that I require it to legalize a sale of dead men. When I have obtained the names of some thousands of serfs, I shall carry my spoil to the south of St. Petersburg or Moscow, and raise a large sum on them. Then I shall be a rich man, and in condition to buy real peasants in flesh and blood."

De Vogüé, Russian Novelists (trans.), p. 75.

Deadwood (ded'wůd). A city, and the county-seat of Lawrence County, South Dakota, situated in the Black Hills in lat. 44° 21′ N., long. 103° 43′ W. It is an important trading center and mining town, gold and silver having been discovered in the vicinity in 1874. Population (1890), 3,589.

Deæ Matres (dē'æ mā'trēz). [L., lit. 'goddesses' mothers.'] See the extract.

We now come to a class of divinities which have a peculiar interest in connection with the early history of our island, the deities of the auxiliary races who formed so important an element of its population. Among these we must place, first, a class of deities commonly known by the title of the deæ matres. Altars and inscriptions to these deities are found in Belgic Gaul and Upper Germany, and more especially along the banks of the Rhine, where they are often called matronæ instead of matres, and they seem to have belonged to the Teutonic race. Not more than one altar to these deities, we believe, been found in Italy, and we do not trace them in the classic writers. When the deæ matres are figured on the altars or other monuments on which they are recorded as three females, seated, with baskets or bowls of fruit on their knees, which were probably emblematical of the plenty which they were believed to distribute to mankind.

De Bry, Théodore. See Bry.

Decameron (de-kam'e-ron). [It. Il Decamerone; from Gr. δέκα, ten, and ἡμέρα, day.] A famous collection of 100 tales, by Boccaccio, published in 1353. Of these tales ten are represented as told each day for ten days, near Florence, during the plague of 1348. The stories are from 1344 to 1350, and are preceded by a masterly description of the plague at Florence. They range from the pathetic to the grossly licentious. "There are few works which have had an equal influence on literature with the Decameron of Boccaccio. Even in England its effects were powerful. From it Chaucer adopted the notion of the frame in which he has inclosed his tales, and the general manner of his stories, while in some instances, as we have seen, he has merely versified the novels of the Italian. In 1566, William Paynter printed many of Boccaccio's stories in English, in his work called the 'Palace of Pleasure.' This first translation contained sixty novels, and it was soon followed by another volume, comprehending thirty-four additional tales. These are the pages of which Shakspere made so much use. From Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy' we learn that one of the great amusements of our ancestors was reading Decameron tales; and an extensive list of their effects were speedily visible in the literature of the country." Dunlop, Hist. Prose Fiction, II. 118.

The seven imaginary ladies and three gentlemen whom Boccaccio supposed to shut out the horrors of the great plague of Florence, in 1348, by staying the days in a garden with a ten-day feast of story-telling, preacted in the best and rascal, though nearly the first, Italian prose: and they have given titles to the divisions of each day from the French journée, from incidents of actual life, or from whatever source was open to the author. Even the machinery by which the tales are set consecutively from the East, and had existed in a Latin form two centuries before. The number of the stories also was perhaps determined by the previous existence of the "Cento Novelle Antiche." Morley, English Writers, I. 221.

Decamps (de-koṅ'). Alexandre Gabriel. Born at Paris, March 3, 1803: died (as the result of an accident) at Fontainebleau, Aug. 22, 1860. A noted French painter, a pupil of Abel de Pujol. Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. A celebrated history by Edward Gibbon, published 1776–88.

De consolatione philosophiæ (dē kon-sō-lā-shi-ō'nē fil-ō-sō'fi-ē). [L., 'on the consolation of philosophy.'] A celebrated Latin work in prose and verse, written by Boethius about 525 A. D. It was translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great. Chaucer translated it into English prose before 1382. Caxton published it in 1480. See Boethius.

Boethius was not put to death at once, but was kept nearly a year in prison. After his condemnation he wrote that famous book, "The Consolations of Philosophy," which is the only one of all his works that still finds readers It is not exactly a literary masterpiece, but as a book written from the heart, a faithful record of the meditations by which a brave and high-minded man consoled himself when, fallen suddenly from the height of wealth and power to the lowest abyss of misery, he was looking forward to an ignominious death, it has a deep interest, and will always be counted among the world's classics. It has been translated into every language in Europe; and amongst the English translators have been King Alfred, Chaucer, and, we are told, Queen Elizabeth.

Decumates Agri (dek-ū-mā'tēz ag'ri). [L., from decuma, tithe: tithe lands.] The name given by the Romans to the lands east of the Rhine and north of the Danube. About the beginning of the 2d century A. D. they were incorporated in the Roman Empire as a part of Rhætia.

We have seen that the history of Rome in her western provinces was, from an early stage of the Empire, a struggle with the Teutonic nations on the Rhine and the Danube. We have seen that all attempts at serious conquest beyond those boundaries came to nothing. The Roman possessions beyond the two great rivers were mere outposts for the better security of the land within the rivers. The district beyond them, fenced in by a wall and known as the Agri Decumates, was hardly more than such an outlying post on a great scale.

Dedan (dē'dan). [Heb., perhaps 'beloved,' 'darling.'] 1. A son of Raamah, son of Cush, son of Ham (Gen. x. 7), and his descendants. —2. A son of Jokshan, grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3). In the prophets the Dedanites are referred to as being settled now in Edom (Idumea), now on the Persian Gulf. Some scholars (Gesenius, Winer) infer that the Cushite Dedanites and those from Keturah were in some way amalgamated by intermarriage, and formed a widely spread trading tribe. There are still ruins of a city in the northern Hedjas (see Arabia) bearing the name of Dedan.

Dedham (ded'am). The capital of Norfolk County, Massachusetts, situated 10 miles southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 7,123.

Dedlock (ded'lok), Lady. The wife of Sir Leicester Dedlock in Dickens's novel "Bleak House": a haughty woman of fashion, secretly consumed with terror, shame, and remorse. She has an illegitimate child, Esther Summerson, but marries Sir Leicester, supposing him ignorant of her history. He becomes known to Mr. Tulkinghorn, her husband's legal adviser, who tells her of his design to reveal it to him. She leaves home and dies from exposure and remorse at the gate of the graveyard where Captain Hawdon, the father of her child, is buried.

Dedlock, Sir Leicester. An extremely ceremonious and stately old baronet in Dickens's novel "Bleak House." He is perfectly honorable, but prejudiced, conventional, and somewhat dry, with a genuine affection and admiration for Lady Dedlock.

Dee (dē). [L. Deva (which see).] 1. A river in North Wales and Cheshire, flowing past Chester into the Irish Sea northwest of Chester. Length, 90 miles.

Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 117.

2. A river in Kincardineshire and Aberdeenshire, Scotland, flowing into the North Sea at Aberdeen. Length, 87 miles.—3. A river in Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, which flows into the Solway Firth at Kirkcudbright Bay. Length, 48 miles.

Dee, John. Born at London, July 13, 1527; died in Dec., 1608. An English mathematician and astrologer. He took the degree of B. A. at Cambridge in 1545; was appointed one of the foundation fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1546; lectured on the Elements of Euclid at Paris about 1550; returned to England in 1551; was prosecuted on the charge of magic about 1555; gave exhibitions of magic at the courts of various princes in Poland and Bohemia (1583–86); and was appointed warden of Manchester College in 1595. He was patronized by Queen Elizabeth, who received instruction from him in astrology in 1564. According to the "Athenæ Cantabrigienses" he left 79 works, many of which have never been printed. His most notable work is "Monas Hieroglyphica" (1564).

Deeg, or Dig (dēg). A fortified place in British India, in lat. 27° 25′ N., long. 77° 15′ E. It was captured by the British in 1804. It contains a palace built by Süraj Mull toward the middle of the 18th century. The portion occupied is 260 feet square, and is traversed by a garden with beautiful architectural adornment. The north pavilion contains a fine audience hall, 77 by 54 feet, divided by a central range of arches. An adjoining side of the court is occupied by a pavilion 108 by 57 feet, open on two sides and including four ranges of columns with arcades edged with sharply cut cusps. The entrances are architecturally noteworthy: they are wide-spreading, often double, and supported by very richly sculptured brackets.

Deems (dēmz), Charles Force. Born at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 4, 1820; died at New York city, Nov. 18, 1893. An American clergyman and writer, pastor of the Church of the Strangers in New York city. He founded the American Institute of Christian Philosophy in 1881.

Deffand, or Deffant (def-fon'), Marquise du (Marie de Vichy-Chamrond). Born at the Château de Chamrond, France, in 1697; died at Paris, Sept. 24, 1780. A witty and cynical Frenchwoman, a leader in Parisian literary and philosophical circles. She was married to the Marquis du Deffand in 1718, but soon separated from him and lived somewhat notoriously. In 1753 she became blind. She is noted for her correspondence with Voltaire, Hainault, Montesquieu, Horace Walpole, and other great men of her time.

Defiance (dē-fī'ans). A town and the county-seat of Defiance County, northwestern Ohio, situated on the Maumee 50 miles southwest of Toledo. Population (1890), 7,694.

De finibus (bonorum et malorum) (dē fin'ī-bus). [L., 'of the boundaries (of good and evil).'] A treatise in five books by Cicero, in the form of a dialogue, consisting in a presentation of the doctrines of the Stoics and Epicureans concerning good and evil. It was written 45 B. C.

De Flores (de flō'rēz). In Middleton's play "The Changeling," an ill-favored, broken gentleman in the service of Vermandero, the father of Beatrice-Joanna. He loves Beatrice, who loathes him. Trusting in his devotion and poverty, she induces him to murder Alonzo de Piracquo, to whom her father has betrothed her though she loves Alsemero. In a powerful scene he declares to her that she shall never marry Alsemero unless he first yields to him. She never relents, and after killing Beatrice dies triumphant, by his own hand, when the double discovery of the liaison and murder is made. "He is a study worthy to be classed with Iago, and inferior only to Iago in their class." Saintsbury.

Defoe (sometimes written De Foe) (de-fō'), Daniel. Born at London, probably in 1661; died at London, April 26, 1731. A celebrated English novelist and political writer. His father, whose name originally was Foe, was a butcher in St. Giles, Cripplegate. Daniel changed it to De Foe, or Defoe, about 1703. Little is known of his early life. He abandoned the idea of being a dissenting minister, went into business in 1685, and in 1688 was with King William's army. He traveled a good deal on the Continent. In 1692 he became a bankrupt, but afterward paid his debts. He then secured a position as secretary to a pantile factory, and was accountant to the commissioners on glass duties. From 1698 he distinguished himself as a pamphleteer in the favor of William III.'s policy. His ironical treatise "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters" in 1703 occasioned his arrest, and he was sentenced to be fined, to stand three times in the pillory, and to be imprisoned during the Queen's pleasure." During this imprisonment he wrote constantly, and began his "Review," a newspaper issued at first once, afterward twice, and ultimately thrice, a week. It was published from Feb. 19, 1704, to June 11, 1713. During this time he also wrote about eighty other works. In 1704 he was released and went to St. Edmund's Bury and then back to London, where he took a prominent part in political intrigue. Finding himself generally objected to as a time-server and turncoat, he made an apology, "An Appeal to Honour and Justice" (1715), which did not remove the impression. From this time until his death he wrote industriously, "Robinson Crusoe" appearing in 1719. Among his other novels are "Life and Adventures of Duncan Campbell" (1720), "Captain Singleton" (1720), "The Fortunes and Misfortunes of Moll Flanders" (1722), "Journal of the Plague Year" (2d ed., entitled "History of the Plague," 1722), "History of Colonel Jack" (1722), "Roxana" (1724), etc. Among his political writings are "The True-Born Englishman" (1701), "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters" (1703), "Political History of the the Devil" (1726), etc. See his Life by Minto (1879), in "English Men of Letters" series.

De imitatione Christi (dē im-i-tā-shi-ō'nē kris'tī). A religious treatise commonly ascribed to Thomas a Kempis, but about which there has been much controversy: it places the rule of life in seclusion and renunciation. Other candidates have been put forward, among them John Gerson, the famous chancellor of the University of Paris, and an unidentified John Gersen, abbot of Vercelli (supported by the Benedictines), whose manuscripts as that of the author are unsubscribed. For Gerson are brought forward a number of early MSS. and editions in France and Italy. "In favour of Thomas a Kempis has been alleged the testimony of the contemporary editions and his name, including one about 1471 which appears to be the first, as well as a general tradition from his own times, extending over most of Europe, which has had a great majority (including the Sorbonne itself) to determine the cause in his favour. It is also said that a manuscript of the treatise De Imitatione bears these words at the conclusion: 'Finitus et completus per manum Thomæ Kempis, 1441,' and that in this manuscript are so many erasures and alterations as to give it the appearance of his original autograph. Against Thomas a Kempis it is asserted that he was a professed callegrapher or copyist for the College of Deventer; that the Chronicle of St. Agnes, a contemporary work, says of him that 'Brilliantly he composed a number . . . and also libros pro domo et pro proximo; that the entry above mentioned is more like that of a transcriber than of an author; that the same chronicle makes no mention of his having written the treatise De Imitatione, nor does it appear in an early list of works ascribed to him." Hallam, Introd. to Lit. of Europe, II. ii. § 63.

Deimos (dī'mos). Gr. δεῖμός, fear, terror; personified in the Iliad, and often regarded as a son of Ares (Mars).] A satellite of Mars, revolving about its primary in thirty hours and eighteen minutes. It was discovered by Professor Asaph Hall, of Washington, in Aug., 1877.

Deiotarus (dē-ī-ot-'ą-rus). [Gr. Δηϊόταρος.] Died about 40 B. C. A tetrarch and king of Galatia, and an ally of the Romans. He was defended before Cæsar by Cicero 45 B. C.

Deïphobus (dē-if'ō-bus). [Gr. Δηΐφοβος.] In classical legends, a Trojan warrior, son of Priam and Hecuba. He appears in Shakspere's "Troilus and Cressida."

Deipnosophists (dīp-nos'ō-fists). [From Gr. Δειπνοσοφισταί, Deipnosophistæ, the name of a work of Athenæus (see the def.): lit. 'the learned men at dinner,' from δεῖπνον, dinner, and σοφιστής, a learned man.] See the extract.

> The Deipnosophists, or "learned guests," of Athenæus is a polyhistorical work chiefly made up of extracts from books in the library of Alexandria, and put into the form of a dialogue, or series of dialogues, supposed to have been carried on in the house of a learned and opulent Roman named Larensius or Laurentius, during an entertainment prolonged through many days. The guests are twenty-nine in number, and not only draw upon their memory for quotations suggested by incidents of the feast, but are expected by their entertainer to come furnished with excerpts from the best authors. These are produced and read when the occasion offers. This machinery enables Athenæus to give a sort of framework and external coherency to the carefully arranged contents of his note book; but, as in the well-known English books called "the Doctor" and "the Pursuits of Literature," the ventilation of the author's learning is the main object of the book. The work begins, like several of Plato's dialogues, with a conversation between Athenæus and a friend of his, one Timocrates, to whom he narrates "the discourses of the learned men," with all their quotations and extracts; and he sometimes interrupts the supposed dialogue itself to address himself directly to Timocrates. Among the supposed guests are some of the most eminent men of the day, especially Masurius Sabinus, a descendant of the great jurist of the Augustan age, and himself one of the leading lawyers in the reign of Alexander Severus; Ulpian, whose death is supposed to take place soon after the entertainment; and Galen of Pergamum, "who has published so many writings on philosophy and medicine as to surpass all his predecessors, and who is equal in style to any of the ancients." These "learned guests" pour forth an unbroken stream of quotations extending through fifteen books, and touching on every subject which could be suggested by a banquet, and many which could not. are brought in by the head and shoulders, so that the work is a complete treasury of information on Greek literature, especially poetry, natural history, medicine, public and social usages, philology and grammar. The authors quoted by Athenæus are about 800, of whom about 700 would have been unknown but for him; and he sometimes gives us as many as 50 quotations from one author. The titles of books which he mentions are about 2,500, and he tells us himself that he had made extracts from more than 800 comedies belonging to the period of the middle comedy only. The extent to which this one book has contributed to repair the ravages of time, and especially to save choice fragments from the wreck of the great Alexandrian museum, in which Athenæus pursued his studies, is shown by the test to which Schweighaeuser appeals, namely, that if we look into any collection of the fragments of any poets, we shall see how large a proportion is due to the Deipnosophists.

Dejanira (dej-an-ī'rą), or Deianeira (dē-yą-nī'rą). [Gr. Δηϊάνειρα.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Œneus and Althæa, sister of Meleager and wife of Hercules. She inadvertently caused his death by giving him the blood steeped in the poison of the Hydra, which she had told her that he could compel the love of any one wearing it. It caused him to die slowly, and she killed herself in sorrow.

Déjazet (dā-zha-zā'), Pauline Virginie. Born at Paris, Aug. 30, 1798; died at Paris, Dec. 1, 1875. A celebrated French actress. She went on the stage almost from her cradle. She appeared for the last time Oct. 2, 1875.

Dejean (de-zhoṅ), Pierre François Aimé Auguste, Comte. Born at Amiens, France, Aug. 10, 1780; died at Paris, March 18, 1845. A French soldier and entomologist. He served with distinction at Lagny and Waterloo, and was appointed general in 1810, aide-de-camp of Napoleon in 1813, and general of division in 1814. He was the author of a catalogue of a collection of insects (1821–33), "Histoire générale des coléoptères" (1825–29), etc.

De Kalb (de kalb), Baron Johann. Born at Huttendorf, near Bayreuth, Bavaria, June 29, 1721; died near Camden, S. C., Aug. 19, 1780. A general in the American Revolution. He entered the French service in 1743, and served in numerous campaigns in 1777, and was mortally wounded at Camden Aug. 16, 1780.

Dekker (dek'er), Eduard Douwes: pseudonym Multatuli. Born at Amsterdam, March 2, 1820; died at Nieder-Ingelheim, Feb. 19, 1887. A Dutch writer. His works include "Max Havelaar" (1860), and other works on the Dutch Indies.

Dekker, or Decker (dek'er), Jeremias de, Born at Dort, Netherlands, about 1610; died at Amsterdam, 1685. A Dutch poet, author of a satire, "Lof der Geldzucht" ("Praise of Avarice"). His collected works were published in 1726.

Dekker, or Decker, Thomas. Born at London about 1570 (?); died at London (?) after 1637. An English dramatist, collaborator of Middleton, Webster, Massinger, Rowley, etc. little is known of his life. He was arrested for Ben Jonson's Diary in 1598: in Feb. of that year he was imprisoned in the Counter. Between 1598 and 1602 he wrote eight plays alone and many others in collaboration. In 1602 he published "Satiromastix, or the Untrussing of the Humorous Poet," a satirical attack on Ben Jonson, with whom a quarrel had broken out before 1600, when Jonson reflected upon him in "Every Man out of his Humour" and "Cynthia's Revels." In 1601 Jonson attacked Dekker and Marston vigorously in "The Poetaster." "Satiromastix" was Dekker's retort. From 1613 to 1616 he seems to have been imprisoned in the King's Bench prison. He wrote many pamphlets ridiculing the follies of the times, and in the plays written with others he excelled in good sharp pictures and those laid in inns, taverns, and suburban pleasure-houses. He also had a poetical and luxuriant fancy. He wrote alone "The Gentle Craft," "Bear a Brain" (1599), "Old Fortunatus" (1600), etc.; and, with Chettle, "Troilus and Cressida," "Agamemnon," and "The Stepmother's Tragedy" (1599); with Chettle and Haughton, "Patient Grissel" (1590); with Day and Haughton, "The Spanish Moor's Tragedy" (1600). With Webster and others he joined in 1602 in a play in two parts on Lady Jane Grey, which probably appeared as "The Famous History of Sir Thomas Wyat" in 1607. The first part of "The Honest Whore," etc., he wrote with Middleton in 1604. The earliest edition known of the second part is dated 1630, and there is nothing to show that Middleton was concerned in it. "The Seven Deadly Sins of London" he published in 1606, and "News from Hell" in the same year. He also wrote "Westward Ho!" before 1605, and "Northward Ho!" "The Belman of London" (1608) "Lanthorne and Candlelight" (the second part of "The Bellman," 1609), "The Gull's Hornbook" (1609), "The Roaring Girl," with Middleton (1611), "If it be not Good the Devil is in It" (1612), "The Virgin Martyr," with Massinger (1622), "Match Me in London" (published 1631), "The Sun's Darling," with Ford, was published in 1656 (the lyrical portions are thought to be Dekker's), "The Witch of Edmonton," with Ford and Rowley, probably written in 1621, published in 1658; and in 1637 Dekker republished "Lanthorne and Candlelight" as "English Villainies"; this was the last of his separate works, the most important of which have been mentioned, and it is thought that he died shortly after its publication. *Dict. Delane (de-lān'), John Thaddeus. Born at London, Oct. 11, 1817; died Nov. 22, 1879. An English journalist, son of W. A. F. Delane; editor of the London "Times" 1841–77.

Delane, William Augustus Frederick. Born about 1793; died at Norwich, England, July 29, 1857. An English journalist, manager of the London "Times."

Delany (dē-la'ni), Mrs. (Mary Granville), born May 14, 1700, at Coulston, Wiltshire; died at Windsor, April 15, 1788. An English woman of literary tastes. She first married Alexander Pendarves and afterward became the wife of Patrick Delany. She was the friend of the Duchess of Portland, and was called by Edmund Mrs. Delany by George III. They were frequent guests in Windsor, and a pension of £300 a year. She presented to the queen some of the "paper mosaic" for which she was famous, and became a favorite with the royal family. She left six volumes of autobiography and letters, which contain much interesting gossip of the society of the time.

Delany, Patrick. Born in Ireland about 1685; died at Bath, May 6, 1768. A popular preacher, afterward dean of Down, in Ireland. He is noted as having been the intimate friend of Swift. In 1737 he began to publish a paper called the "Humanist," advocating the prevention of cruelty to animals. He wrote a number of volumes of sermons, "Reflections on Polygamy," etc. (1738), "The Life and Reign of David, King of Israel" (1740–42), "A Humble Apology for Christian Orthodoxy" (1761), etc.

De la Ramée (dē lą rą-mā'), Louise: pseudonym Ouida. Born at Bury St. Edmunds, England, in 1840. An English novelist, of French extraction. Her works include "Strathmore" (1865), "Chandos" (1866), "Idalia" (1867), "Tricotrin" (1868), "Puscarel" (1870), "Ariadne" (1880), "Moths" (1880), "Princess Napraxine" (1884), etc.

Delaroche (de-là-rosh'), Paul (Hippolyte). Born at Paris, July 17, 1797; died there, Nov. 4, 1856. A French historical and portrait painter. He began by studying landscape under Watelet, which he gave up for history after the study of Baron Gros. He first attracted attention by his picture of "Joash saved from Death by Jehoshabeth" (1822). He received the gold medal in 1824, became Knight of the Legion of Honor in 1828, officer in 1834, member of the Institute in 1832, and professor at the Academy in 1833. The following year he went to Italy, and on his return painted the famous hemicycle of the École des Beaux Arts. At the time of his second visit in July, 1841, he was made a member of the Academy of St. Luke.

Delarue (de-là-rü'), Gervais, Abbé. Born at Caen, France, 1751; died 1835. A French historian and antiquarian, professor in the University of Caen. He wrote "Essais historiques sur les bardes, les jongleurs et les trouvères normands et anglo-normands" (1834), etc.

Delavigne (de-la-vēny'), Jean François Casimir. Born at Havre, France, April 4, 1793; died at Lyons, France, Dec. 11, 1843. A French dramatist and poet. He began his studies in his native city, and completed them in Paris. As early as 1811 he attracted the attention of Napoleon Bonaparte by his "Hellénique sur la naissance du fils de Rome," and repeated twice, but without success, for prizes of the French Academy; his subjects were in 1813 "Charles XII. à Narva," and in 1815 "Découverte de la vaccine," which was connected with Napoleon's downfall led Delavigne to write three elegies, "Les Messéniennes." Two of these, viz. "Waterloo" and "La Vaccination du musée," were subsequently published with an article "Sur le besoin de s'unir après le départ des étrangers," and in this form they widely attracted sympathy and favor. "La vie et la mort de Jeanne d'Arc," "Tyrtée," "Le voyageur," "A Napoléon," and "Lord Byron," were well received in 1824. The following year was spent in Italy, where Delavigne wrote the "Nouvelles Messéniennes." After the stormy days of the revolution of July, 1830, he composed "La Parisienne," sung to music by Auber; also the "Dies irae de Saint-Louis" and "La Varsovienne." In 1845, in collaboration with his brother Germain, Casimir Delavigne wrote the libretto to Halévy's opera "Charles VI." His contributions to the stage include the "Vepres siciliennes" (1819), "Les comédiens" (1820), "Le paria" (1821), "L'école des vieillards" (1823), "La princesse Aurélie" (1825), "Marino Faliero" (1829), "Louis XI." (1832), "Les enfants d'Edouard" (1833), "Don Juan d'Autriche" (1835), "La famille au temps de Luther" (1836), "La popularité" (1838), "La fille du Cid" (1839), and "Le conseiller rapporteur" (1850). He was elected to the French Academy Feb. 24, 1825. His works were edited in full by his brother in 1845, 1855, and 1863. A separate reprint of his poems and plays was also made in 1858.

Delaware (del'a-wār). [Pl., also Delawares.] A division of the North American Indians, classed as a tribe, but in many respects a confederacy. They formerly occupied the valley of the Delaware River in Pennsylvania, and the greater part of New Jersey and Delaware. The name was given by the English from the river where they were found, their council-fire being near the site of Philadelphia. They call themselves Lenni-Lenape ('original men' or 'preeminent men'). The French called them Loups ('wolves'), from their chief totemic division. In 1726 they refused to join the Iroquois in a war upon the English, and were stigmatized by the Iroquois as "women." In 1742 and later they were pressed successively to the Susquehanna and Ohio rivers, afterward to Missouri and Arkansas. Most of them are now in the Indian Territory, connected with the Cherokees. Their number is about 1,700. See Algonquian.

Delaware (del'a-wār). 1. One of the Middle States, and, next to Rhode Island, the smallest State of the American Union, lying between Pennsylvania on the north, Delaware River and Bay (separating it from New Jersey) and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, and Maryland on the south and west. The surface is generally level, but hilly in the north. The leading productions are wheat, Indian corn, and fruit (especially peaches). The State is divided into three counties: the capital is Dover, and the chief place Wilmington. It sends one representative and two senators to Congress, and has 3 electoral votes. It was permanently settled by Swedes under Peter Minuit in 1638; passed under the rule of the Dutch in 1655, and of the English in 1664. In 1682 it became united with Pennsylvania; in 1700 it received a separate assembly, but had a governor in common with Pennsylvania until the Revolution. It is one of the thirteen original States, and was the first State to ratify the Federal Constitution, Dec. 7, 1787. It was a slave State, but sided with the Union in the war of 1861–65. Area, 2,050 square miles. Population (1890), 168,493.

2. A river of the United States which rises in Delaware County, New York, and separates Pennsylvania and Delaware on the west from New York and New Jersey on the east. It expands into Delaware Bay about 40 miles below Philadelphia. On its banks are Trenton, Easton, Philadelphia, Camden, Chester, and Wilmington. Its chief tributaries are the Lehigh and Schuylkill, on the west. Length, 390 miles; navigable for ocean steamships to Philadelphia; tidal as far as Trenton.

3. A city and the county-seat of Delaware County, Ohio, situated on the Whetstone (Olentangy) River 23 miles north of Columbus. It is the seat of Ohio Wesleyan University. Population (1890), 8,224.

Delaware, Lord. See Delaware.

Delaware Bay. An arm of the Atlantic Ocean and estuary of the Delaware River, which separates Delaware from New Jersey. Its entrance to the Atlantic, between Capes May and Henlopen, is about 10 miles in width. Length, about 55 miles. Greatest width, about 25 miles.

Delaware Water Gap. A village and summer resort in Monroe County, Pennsylvania, 65 miles northwest of New York. Also, the name of the adjoining gorge, 2 or 3 miles in length, by which the Delaware River passes through the Kittatinny Mountain (between walls 1,400 feet in height).

Delawarr, or Delaware, Baron. See West.

Delbrück (del'brük), Martin Friedrich Rudolf. Born at Berlin, April 16, 1817. A Prussian statesman. He entered the ministry of commerce in 1848, and was president of the chancery of the North German Confederation 1867–71, and of the imperial chancery 1871–76.

Delectable Mountains, The. A range of mountains in Bunyan's, "Pilgrim's Progress," from which a view of the Celestial City is to be had. They are "Emmanuel's Land," and the sheep that feed on them are those for whom he died. See Isa. xxxiii. 16, 17.

Delémont (de-lā-mōn'), G. Delsberg (dels'berg). A small town in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, situated on the Sorne 18 miles southwest of Basel.

Delescluze (de-leklüz'), Louis Charles. Born at Dreux, France, Oct. 20, 1809; killed at the barricades, Paris, May 28, 1871. A French journalist and political agitator, leader of the Commune of Paris March–May, 1871.

Delessert (de-le-sār'), Baron Benjamin. Born at Lyons, Feb. 14, 1773; died at Paris, March 1, 1847. A French naturalist and philanthropist. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies 1817–38, and contributed largely to the introduction of savings-banks in France. He was a collaborator of De Candolle in the publication of "Icones selectæ plantarum" (1820–40).

Delfshaven (delfs-hä'ven), or Delftshaven (delfts-hä'ven). A seaport in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated on the Schie 5 miles southeast of The Hague. It was formerly celebrated for the manufacture of pottery and porcelain. It contains some interesting buildings, the old and new churches, Pilgrimsfather and Stadhuis. It was the birthplace of Grotius, and the place of assassination of William the Silent in 1584. Population (1889), commune, 28,383.

Delft (delft). A town in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated on the Schie 5 miles southeast of The Hague. It was formerly celebrated for the manufacture of pottery and porcelain. Population (1889), commune, 28,383.

Delhi (del'hi), or Dehli (dā'le). 1. A division in the Panjab, British India. Area, 5,610 square miles. Population, 1,907,330. It was formed in the above division. Area, 1,276 square miles. Population, 643,515.—3. The capital of the division and district of Delhi, situated on the Jumna in lat. 28° 40′ N., long. 77° 18′ E. The city of Indraprastha (which see) is said (Mahabharata) to have occupied the site of Delhi in the 15th century B. C. Delhi was captured by Mohammed of Ghor in 1193 A. D., and a few years later became the capital of a Mohammedan monarchy. It was sacked by Timur in 1398, and occupied by Baber in 1526. Delhi now became the capital of the Mogul empire, and was rebuilt by Shah Jehan in 1638–58. It was sacked by Nadir Shah in 1739, and occupied by the British under Lake in 1803, although it continued to be the residence of the titular Grand Mogul down to 1857. It was captured by the Sepoy mutineers May 1, 1857, and was besieged in June by the British, and retaken Sept. 20, 1857. Among the notable structures in Delhi are: (a) The tomb of Humayun Shah, completed by his successor Akbar in the second half of the 16th century. The plan is about square; the tomb-chamber is octagonal, with great canopied portals on four of its sides and smaller octagonal chambers on the four others. The central space is covered by a graceful dome. The decoration is much simpler than that of the later Mogul architecture, consisting chiefly of keeled arcades of different sizes framed in rectangular panels. (b) The palace built by Shah Jehan in the middle of the 17th century. It has been called the most splendid of Oriental palaces. The massive towered wall inclosses an area of about 1,600 by 3,200 feet. The main entrance opens on a noble vaulted hall 375 feet long, from which are reached in succession two spacious courts. On the second of these faces the hall of public audience, an open arcaded structure with subsidiary arches and coupled columns in the exterior range. On another court, toward the river, is the hall of private audience (Dewan i-Khas), similar to the first, but with square piers to the arcades and beautiful inlaying in colored stones. On the river side stands also the Rung Mehal, or Painted Hall, an admirable structure, which includes a bath. (c) The Jami Musjid, or Great Mosque, built by Shah Jehan in the middle of the 17th century. It is very large, and the grouping of the three lofty monumental gates and the kiosked angle towers of its court with the lofty minarets, the great entrance-arcade, and the three fine bulbous domes of the sanctuary produces an unusually impressive architectural effect. The court is raised on a high basement, and is surrounded by graceful open arcades. The minarets rise from the ends of the façade of the mosque proper, and between them and the central arch there are on each side five fine arcades surmounted by paneling in red sandstone and white marble. Above the cornice are placed a range of close-set, rounded battlements. Population (1891), 192,579.

Delia (dē'li-à). [Gr. Δήλια.] An name given to Artemis, from the island of Delos, her birthplace. Similarly Apollo, the sun-god, was called Delius.—2. A shepherdess in Vergil's Eclogues.

Delight of Mankind. An epithet of the emperor Titus.

Delilah (dē-lī'là). [Heb., 'weak,' 'feeble'; Gr. Δαλῒλη.] A woman of the valley of Sorek, mistress of Samson. She discovered the secret of Samson's strength, and betrayed him to the Philistines. Judges xvi.

Delille, or Delisle (de-lēl'), Jacques. Born at Aigueperse, Puy-de-Dôme, France, June 22, 1738; died at Paris, May 1, 1815. A French didactic poet and translator. His works include "Les jardins" (1780), "La pitié" (1803), a translation of Vergil's Georgics (1769), etc.

Jacques Delille and his extraordinary popularity form, perhaps, the greatest satire on the taste of the eighteenth century in France. His translation of the Georgics was supposed to make him the equal of Virgil, and brought him not merely fame, but solid reward. His principal work was the poem of "Les Jardins," which he followed up with others of the same kind. Though he emigrated he did not lose his fame, and to the day of his death was considered to be the first poet of France, or to share that honour with Lebrun-Pindare. Delille has expiated his popularity by a full half century of contempt, and his work is, indeed, valueless as poetry.

Della Cruscan School (del'ä krus'kan skōl). A small clique of English poets of both sexes who originally met in Florence about 1783. Their productions, which were affected and sentimental, were published in England in the "World" and the "Oracle." They were attacked by Gifford (1794-96) in "The Baviad" and "The Meviad" (which see). Robert Merry adopted the pseudonym "Della Crusca," Mrs. Hannah Cowley "Anna Matilda" (which see), and Edward Jerningham "The Bard." These, with Edward Topham, the Rev. Charles Este, James Boswell, Mrs. Piozzi, and others, formed the school. They took their name from the Florentine Accademia della Crusca (which see).

Delos (dē'los), modern Gr. Mikra Dilos ('little Delos'). [Gr. Δῆλος.] The smallest island of the Cyclades, situated in the Ægean Sea in lat. 37° 23′ N., long. 25° 22′ E.: the ancient Asteria or Ortygia. According to Greek legends it was originally a floating island, and was the birthplace of Apollo and Artemis. It was the seat of a great sanctuary in honor of Apollo, one of the most famous religious foundations of antiquity. From the time of Solon, Athens sent an annual embassy to the Delian festival, and soon took a leading place; and in 454 B. C. the sacred treasure of Delos was removed to the Athenian Acropolis. The Athenian mastery lasted, with a short interruption, until 315 B. C., when Delos became semi-independent, under the protection of various Eastern states, and finally of Rome, and soon, owing to its central position, developed into a great commercial mart. The sanctuary of Apollo has been excavated by the French school at Athens since 1873. The work has advanced slowly, and is not yet complete; but it has been pursued with little interruption, and ranks as one of the chief achievements of its kind. The buildings described lie for the most part within the inclosure or temenos of Apollo, which is of trapezoform shape, and about 650 feet to a side. In addition to the interesting finds of architecture and sculpture, epigraphical discoveries of the highest importance have been made, bearing upon history and upon the religious and administration of the sanctuary.

Delos, Confederacy of. A Hellenic league, formed probably about 477 B. C., with its political center at Athens and its treasury at Delos (removed later to Athens). It was formed by Aristides, and various maritime states (Eupatoria, Ægara, Naxos, Thasos, Iesbos, Cheos, Samos, etc.). Many of them were soon absorbed by Athens, and the league developed into an Athenian empire.

Delphi (del'fī), modern Kastri. [Gr. Δελφοί.] In ancient topography, a town in Phocis, Greece, situated 6 miles from the Corinthian Gulf, at the foot of Mount Parnassus: the seat of a world-renowned oracle of Pythian Apollo, the most famous of antiquity. The oracle was of prehistoric foundation, and was still respected when silenced by Theodosius the Great (about 390 A. D.). Here many of the gifted states and men should who sought or had obtained the aid of the oracle, the Delphic sanctuary became enormously rich, not only in architecture and works of art, but also in treasure. The treasuries of the last kind were plundered in antiquity, and Nero and other emperors robbed it of an almost incredible number of bronze statues. See Pausanias, Bk. x. The excavations at Delphi, that much in the way of sculpture, architecture, and historical inscriptions will be found by the French archæological school at Athens, the first of which, Ravaisson, had before been possible, because the village of Kastri covered the site of the sanctuary. The village has now been removed, preparatory to the French exploration, to the site of Delphi. Besides the temple, the orchestra of the sanctuary contained a theater, the scene-building, the basis for the Portico of the Athenians, a number of treasuries, the colossal bronze statues and almost innumerable statues and other votive offerings. Buildings only second in importance were ranged outside of the inclosure.

Among his plays are "Les Pods" (1880) and "Le Rendez-vous de patte" (1885). He otherwise published a novel, "Le fils de Coralie" (which was successful and was dramatized 1879), "Le pere de Martial" (1880) and "La marâtre" (1882). "Poésies nouvelles" appeared in 1889, "Comme dans la vie" and "Tous les deux" in 1890.

Delta (del'tä). Any tract of land, inclosed by the mouths of a river, in shape like the Greek letter delta (Δ); specifically, the delta of the Nile.

Herodotus considers the Delta to end at Heliopolis (ii. 7), which brings the head of the Delta nearly opposite the present Shoobra. Here the river separated into three branches, the Pelusiac or Bubastite to the E., the Canopic or Bolbitine farther to the W., and the Sebennytic, which ran between them continuing in the same general line of direction northward which the Nile had up to this point, and piercing the Delta through its centre. The Tanitic, which ran out of the Sebennytic, was at first the same as the Busiritic, but afterward received the name of Tanitic from the city of Tanis (now San), which stood on its eastern bank. Beyond between the Tanitic and Pelusiac branches was the isle of Myecphoris, which Herodotus says was opposite Bubastis (ii. 166). The Mendesian, which also ran eastward from the Sebennytic passed by the ancient town of Mansoorah, and thence running by Mendes from which it was called, entered the sea to the W. of the Tanitic. The Diolcitic mouth was that of the modern Rosetta branch, as the Bucolic or Phatmetic was that of Damietta, and the lower parts of both these branches were artificial, or made by the hand of man, on which account through Herodotus mentions seven he omits the number of the mouths of the Nile to five. These two artificial outlets of the Nile are the only ones now remaining, the others having either disappeared, or being dry in most places during the summer.

Demosthenes (dē-mos'thē-nēz). [Gr. Δημοσθένης.] Died at Syracuse, 413 B. C. An Athenian general. In 425 he defended Pylos against the Spartans, and made their dispositions by which the enemy was forced to capitulate, although the glory of the exploit was claimed by Cleon, who relieved him in the command. He commanded under Nicias in the disastrous Sicilian expedition against Syracuse in 413. Having been captured in the retreat, he was put to death by order of the Syracusan assembly.

Demosthenes. [Gr. Δημοσθένης.] Born at Pæania, Attica, in 384 or 385 B. C.: died in 322 B. C. The greatest of Greek orators. He is said to have been the pupil of the orator Isæus, and entered public life as a speaker in the popular assembly in 355. In 352 he delivered the first of a splendid series of orations directed against the encroachment of Philip of Macedon, three of which are specifically denominated "Philippics" (in 346 he served as a member of the embassy which concluded with Philip the so-called peace of Philocrates. As Philip immediately after broke this treaty, Demosthenes came forward as the leader of the patriotic party in opposition to the Macedonian, which was headed by Æschines. In 340 he caused a fleet to be sent to the relief of Byzantium, which was besieged by Philip. On the outbreak of the Amphictyonic war, he persuaded the Athenians to form an alliance with Thebes against Philip, who defeated the allies at Chæronea in 338, and usurped the hegemony of Greece. He was one of the leaders of the unsuccessful rising which took place on the death of Philip in 336; was exiled by the Macedonian party in 324; was recalled by the patriotic party on the outbreak of a fresh rising at the death of Alexander in 323; and on the capture of Athens by Antipater and Craterus in 322 fled to Calauria, near Troizēn, where he took poison to avoid capture. His chief orations are three "Philippics" (351, 344, 341), three "Olynthiacs" (349, 349, 348), "On the Peace" (346), "On the Embassy" (343), "On the Affairs of the Chersonese" (341), and "On the Crown" (330). The first printed collective edition of his orations is that published by Aldus at Venice in 1504. The best modern editions are those by Bekker (Berlin, 1854) and Dindorf (1851), Dindorf (1846–51), and Whiston (1859–68). See Schäfer's "Demosthenes und seine Zeit" (1856–58). There is a portrait-statue of Demosthenes, one of the finest of antiquity, in the Vatican, Rome. The expression of the close-bearded face is anxious, but full of strength and high resolve. The position is easy, the clothing a full, plainly draped himation.

Demotika, or Demotica (de-mot'i-kä). A town in Rumelia, European Turkey, situated on the Maritza 23 miles south of Adrianople. Population, estimated, 8,000–10,000.

Denderah, or Dendera (den'dėr-ä). A town in Upper Egypt, situated on the Nile in lat. 29° 9′ N., long. 32° 39′ E.: the ancient Tentyra or Tentyris. It is celebrated for its temple of Hathor, which, notwithstanding its late date (it was begun by the 11th Ptolemy, and the great pronaos was added only under Tiberius), is one of the most interesting buildings in Egypt, owing to its almost perfect preservation, even to the roof. The imposing hexastyle pronaos has four ranges of Hathoric columns; on its ceiling is a noted sculptured zodiac, combining Egyptian and classical elements. Next to the pronaos is a hypostyle hall of six columns, from which three chambers open on each side, and beyond this is a vestibule before a large hall in which stands an isolated cella. This hall is surrounded by a series of chambers, one of which in the middle of the back wall contained the emblematic sistrum of the goddess. The whole interior surface is sculptured, the art, however, being inferior. On the roof there is a small sixchambered temple to the local divinity Osiris-An.

On the celebrated zodiac of Dendera, the date of which is believed to be about 700 B. C., the signs of the zodiac are exhibited in a primitive pictorial form, which leaves no doubt as to their significance. Tal'aptor, The Alphabet, I. 7.

Dendermonde (den-der-mōn'de), F. Termonde (ter-mōnd'). A fortified town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated at the junction of the Dender and Schelde, 17 miles northwest of Brussels. In 1667, being besieged by Louis XIV., the town was defended by opening its sluices and flooding the adjacent country. Taken by Marlborough in 1706, and by the French in 1745. Population (1890), 9,606.

Dendin (don-dañ'), Perrin. An ignorant peasant, applied to as a judge, in Rabelais's "Pantagruel." His method was to let people fight till they were tired of it—a satire on lawyers who prefer the ruin of their client to the slightest concession. He loved eating and drinking, and settled the disputes of his neighbors while indulging these tastes.

Its surface is generally level. It is divided into 7 provinces. The capital is Copenhagen. The government is a constitutional hereditary monarchy, with a Rigsdag composed of an upper house (Landsthing) of 66 members and a lower house (Folkething) of 102 members. The established religion is Lutheran. The army numbered in 1892 (on a war footing) 59,562. Its foreign possessions are the Faroe Islands, Iceland, Greenland, and, in the West Indies, Santa Cruz, St. Thomas, and St. John. In the early middle ages it was famous as the home of pirates. The different kingdoms in Denmark became consolidated into one in the 9th century. During this period Christianity was introduced, and in the reign of Canute the Great (died 1035), who reigned also over England and Norway. It was separated from the other kingdoms after Canute's death. Denmark was conquered over the Baltic Wends in the 12th and 13th centuries, and for short periods over Esthonia, Ehsen, and various German districts. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark were united by the Union of Kalmar in 1397, but Sweden was finally separated from Denmark in 1523. Protestantism was introduced in the middle of the 16th century, and the country took part, on the Protestant side, in the Thirty Years' War. Lago, Oseö, and Gothland were lost to Sweden in 1645, as were also the Danish possessions in southern Sweden in 1658. Absolute power was obtained by the kings in 1660. Denmark took part in the alliance of northern powers against Great Britain, and suffered in the battle of the Baltic in 1801 and the bombardment of Copenhagen in 1807. Norway was ceded to Sweden in 1814. (For the relations with Schleswig and Holstein, see those names.) The Schleswig-Holstein war in 1864, waged unsuccessfully to Denmark against Prussia and Austria, effected the loss of Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg. The present constitution was adopted in 1866, and recent history has been marked by a constitutional struggle between the government and the people. Area, 15,289 square miles. Der-el-Bahri (dĕr-el-bäh'rē), or Deir-el-Bahari (dār-el-bä'hā-rē). A locality west of Thebes, Egypt, near the western bank of the Nile, famous for its ruins. Among the ruins is a temple built by Hatshepsu, sister of Thothmes II. and III. (about 1600 B. C.). The inclosure is preceded by a dromos 1,000 feet long, between lines of sphinxes, at the end of which rose two obelisks. The inner court is entered by a fine granite pylon, and behind it is the temple itself. The plan is peculiar, as the buildings extend up the slope of the mountain in stages connected by flights of steps. The masonry is of a beautiful fine limestone, and the sculptures are of great importance, representing especially sacrificial scenes, military triumphs and captives, and payment of tribute. A number of the inner chambers and passages are covered with pseudo-vaulting of stones corbeled out from the walls. Here, in 1881, Maspero made by chance a remarkable archeological discovery: that of a number of mummies of the Pharaohs, including those of some of the most famous of Egyptian kings, among them Thothmes II. and Thothmes III., the conqueror of Assyria, Seti I., and the great Rameses II., the "Pharaoh of the Oppression." These mummies are in remarkable preservation, and supply a not inadequate picture of the features of the sovereigns in life. The discovery was made through a quarrel of some Arabs, who had found a pit near the Sheikh Abd-el-Gournah hill, and were surreptitiously removing the contents. The mummies had evidently been brought from the royal tombs, which lie at no great distance, and placed in this pit for safety during some threatened danger. They are now preserved in the Gizeh Museum, Cairo. A second important discovery of concealed mummies was made in 1891.

Descartes (dā-kärt'), René (Latinized Renatus Cartesius). Born at La Haye, Touraine, France, March 31, 1596: died at Stockholm, Feb. 11, 1650. A celebrated French philosopher, founder of Cartesianism and of modern philosophy in general. He was graduated at seventeen from the Jesuit college of La Flèche, spent five years in Paris (1613–18), and then served for a month in search of knowledge in Germany, Italy, Holland, and Poland. In 1628 he attended the siege of La Rochelle as a volunteer. From 1629 to 1649 he lived chiefly in Holland, spreading and defending his philosophical ideas. He finally went to Stockholm on the invitation of Queen Christina of Sweden; five months later he died there of pneumonia. The work that has made him famous as a philosopher is a short treatise entitled "Discours de la méthode" (Leyden, 1637). It was published in French together with three essays in support of it: his theories, "La dioptrique," "Les météores," and "La géométrie." In it he revolutionized the science of thought. Descartes himself published during his lifetime "Meditationes de prima philosophia" (Paris, 1641; Amsterdam, 1642; translated into French, 1647), "Principia philosophiæ" (Amsterdam, 1644), "Traité des passions de l'âme" (Amsterdam, 1649), and a polemic pamphlet entitled "Epistola Renati Descartes ad Gisbertum Voëtium" (Amsterdam, 1643). Among his friends published his "De l'homme" (1664), "Traité de la formation du fœtus" (1664), "Le monde ou traité de la lumiere de Descartes" (1664), "Lettres" (1657–67), and "Opuscula posthuma, physica et mathematica" (Amsterdam, 1701). Descartes ranked among the foremost mathematicians of his day. A separate reprint was made of his geometry, and the work itself was translated into Latin in 1649, and reprinted in 1659 with notes and comments. In this form it constituted a classic standard throughout Europe, and presented an entirely new basis for the study of algebra and geometry.

Descent from the Cross. 1. A painting by Sodoma (Bazzi) (1504), in the Accademia at Siena, Italy. The group of mourning women is especially admired for the beauty of its conception and execution.

2. A fine painting by Gerard David, in the Chapelle du Saint Sang at Bruges, Belgium. The Virgin and Mary Salome are grouped with St. John about the body of Christ, which is supported by Nicodemus. In the background the cross is seen. The Magdalen and Joseph of Arimathea are painted on the wings.

3. A noteworthy painting by Cavazzola, in the Pinacoteca at Verona. It unites the naturalism of the 15th century with the freedom of the following period. With his companion piece, the "Descent of the Cross" and the "Agony in the Garden," it is the painter's masterpiece.

4. A painting by Correggio, in the Pinacoteca at Parma, Italy.—5. A painting by Titian, in the Accademia, Venice. It has been injured by restoration, but shows great invention and power of expression. It is remarkable as having been painted in Titian's ninety-ninth year (1576), the year of his death.

6. A painting by Rubens (1614), considered his masterpiece, in Antwerp cathedral, Belgium. The body has been detached and is being lowered by men on ladders; it is received below by St. John, beside whom kneel Mary Salome and the Magdalen. The Virgin stands behind.

Deschamps (dā-shoṅ'). Eustache, called Morel. Born at Vertus, Marne, France, in the first part of the 15th century. A French poet. He was the author of ballades (1,175 in number), rondeaux, virelais, etc.; of one long poem, the "Miroir de mariage"; and of "Art de dicter" (a treatise on French rhetoric and prosody).

Deslée (dā-lā'). Aimée Olympe. Born Nov. 18, 1836: died at Paris, March 9, 1874. A French actress. She excelled in the modern dramas "Frou-Frou," "Diane de Lys," etc.

Desdemona (dez-de-mō'nä). In Shakspere's tragedy "Othello," the wife of Othello the Moor, and the daughter of Brabantio, a Venetian senator. Othello smothers her in an outburst of rage produced by a belief in her unfaithfulness, carefully instilled by Iago. According to Malone, the first woman (name unknown) who appeared in any regular drama performed the part of Desdemona.

The most characteristic which belongs to Desdemona, that highest charm of the womanly nature, which Iago names not, because he knows it not or believes not in it: namely, her humility, her harmless ingenuousness, her modesty and innocence. The mirror of this soul has never been darkened by the breath of an impure thought; it abhors her to speak the mere word of sin; her name is clear and "fresh as Diana's visage." The genuineness of her soul and mind culminates—and this is the highest point of her nature—in a perfect freedom from suspicion too deeply rooted in her for this suspicions world.

Gervinus, Shakespeare Commentaries (tr. by F. E. Bunnett, [ed. 1880), p. 516.

Desden con el desden, El. ['Disdain met with disdain.'] A play by Moreto (1618–69), the idea of which was taken from Lope de Vega. It is not known when it was first produced, but it is still played, and is one of the four classical pieces of the older Spanish drama. Under the title of "Donna Diana" it is familiar in Germany, and in 1861 Mr. Westland Marston produced it under the same name in England, his version being a translation of that of Schreyvogel. Molière's version, "La princesse d'Élide," was a failure. Count Carlo Gozzi published an Italian version ("La Principessa Filosofa o il Contraveleno" ("The Philosophical Princess or the Antidote").

Desdichado (des-di-chä'dō). ['Disinherited.'] In Sir Walter Scott's novel "Ivanhoe," the device assumed by Ivanhoe in the tournament at Ashby.

Despard (des'pärd), Edward Marcus. Born in Queen's County, Ireland, in 1751: died Feb. 21, 1803. An Irish conspirator. He entered the army in 1766, obtained the rank of captain about 1780, and in 1784 was appointed superintendent of his Majesty's affairs on the Spanish Mosquito Shore. Having been dismissed from the service of the latter charge, he organized a conspiracy against the government, in consequence of which he was arrested Nov. 16, 1802, and hanged at London.

Despenser (de-spen'ser). Hugh le. Died Aug. 4, 1265. A justiciar of England. He first appears in 1256, when he was introduced with Rhaesa ap Gruffydd to Henry III. as a messenger from Llewelyn ap Iorwerth. He is found in the Fine Rolls in 1261. He joined the baronial party at the outbreak of the war with Henry III. in 1263, and fell in the battle of Evesham.

Despenser, Hugh le, Born March 1, 1283: died Oct. 24, 1326. An English court favorite. He was the grandson of the justiciar Hugh le Despenser, who fell in the baronial ranks at Evesham. He was with the king in Gascony in 1294, was present at the battle of Dunbar in 1296, accompanied the expedition to Flanders in 1297, was sent on a mission to Pope Clement V. at Lyons in 1305, and was created earl of Winchester in 1322. On the defeat of the barons at Boroughbridge in 1322, he was the leader of the court party in opposition to the baronial, and together with his son Hugh le Despenser obtained a complete ascendency over Edward II. The unscrupulous manner in which the favorites used their power to further schemes of self-agrandizement caused them to be banished 1321–22, and brought about a rising of the barons under Queen Isabella in 1326, which ended in the deposition of the king and the execution of the favorites. The elder Despenser was captured at the surrender of Bristol, where he was tried and executed on the charge of treason.

Despenser, Hugh le. Died Nov., 1326. An English court favorite, son of Hugh le Despenser, earl of Winchester. He was appointed chamberlain to Edward II. in 1413. Originally an adherent of the baronial party, he joined his father (see) in the support of the king about 1317, and obtained in an especial degree the royal favor. He was banished with his father in 1321, returning with him in 1322. On the rising of the barons under Queen Isabella in 1326, caused by the insolence and self-seeking of himself and his father, he fled with Edward from London, Oct. 2, 1326, but was captured at Llantrissant Nov. 16, 1326, and was tried and executed on the charge of treason.

Des Périers, Bonaventure. See Périers.

Deucalion (dū-kal'i-on). [Gr. Δευκαλίων.] In Greek legend, a king of Phthia in Thessaly, a son of Prometheus and Clymene, who with his wife Pyrrha was saved from a deluge sent by Zeus. On the advice of his father he built a wooden chest in which he and his wife were saved, floating during nine days and landed on Mount Parnassus and sacrificed to Zeus. To renew the human race, destroyed by the deluge, he and Pyrrha were directed to veil their faces and throw behind them the bones of their mother. Through a misunderstanding they threw stones, and those thrown by Deucalion became men and those thrown by Pyrrha women; and with these Deucalion founded a kingdom in Locris

Deuteronomy (dū-te-ron'ō-mi). [Gr. δευτερονόμιον, the second law.] The fifth and last book of the Pentateuch, containing the last discourses of Moses, delivered in the plain of Moab. It begins with a recapitulation of the events of the last month of the forty years' wandering of the Israelites in the desert (i.-iv. 40); then follows the main body of the book, setting forth the laws which were to regulate the Israelites when they should become settled in the promised land; while chapters xxvi. xxxiv. contain the farewell speeches of Moses. Deuteronomy is assumed by religious and secular ethics. Compared with the other books of the Pentateuch it is distinguished by a warm, oratorical tone. The laws of the preceding books are modified, and their prescriptions in more spiritual form inculcated. On account of these differences Deuteronomy is now assigned by many critics to a different author and date from the rest of the Pentateuch. Owing to the fact that the second reformation of King Josiah appears to carry out the principles of Deuteronomy, it is concluded that "the book of the law" discovered by the priest Hilkiah in the temple in 622 B. C., which began the reformation of Josiah, was Deuteronomy. But its composition must certainly have originated at an earlier date. This is put by many critics in the reign of Manasseh. (698-643 B. C.)

An English nobleman, son of the first Earl of Essex, and a favorite of Queen Elizabeth. He was appointed in 1587 general of the horse to the expedition sent under Leicester to the aid of the States-General. In 1587 he attended the court of Queen Elizabeth, who at this time began to show him unmistakable signs of affection. He married the widow of Sir Philip Sidney in 1590, became a privy councilor in 1593, commanded the land forces in the expedition against Cadiz in 1596, was appointed earl marshal of England in 1597, and became chancellor of Cambridge University in 1598. In 1599 he was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, in which post he aroused the queen's anger by the failure of his operations against the Irish rebels. He returned to England to lay his defense before the queen in person, and, failing to regain his standing at court, formed a conspiracy to compel her by force of arms to dismiss his enemies in the council. He was arrested and executed on the charge of treason.

Devereux, Robert, third Earl of Essex. Born at London, 1591: died Sept. 14, 1646. An English general, son of the second Earl of Essex. He was appointed general of the Parliamentary army on the outbreak of the civil war in 1642; fought the Royalist forces in the drawn battle of Edgehill in 1642; captured Reading, relieved Gloucester, and gained the first battle of Newbury in 1643; lost his army in the unsuccessful campaign in Cornwall in 1644; and resigned his command on the passage of the Self-Denying Ordinance in 1645.

Devil's Dyke. An ancient earthwork, 18 feet high, of great historic interest, in Cambridgeshire, England, extending from Reach to Wood-Ditton. There is another natural "Devil's Dyke" near Brighton, England.

> The Devil's Dyke, as this barrier is called, is clearly a work of defence against enemies advancing from the Fens; and as a defence to the East Anglians it was of priceless value, for, stretching as it did from a point where the country became fenny and impassable to a point where the woods equally forbade all access, it covered the only entrance to the country they had won. But if the dyke be the work of the conquerors of this part of the coast, its purely defensive character shows that their attack was at an end; and that it was rather as assailants than as prey that they regarded the towns of Central Britain. Green, Making of England, p. 51.

Devil's Lake. A lake in the northeastern part of North Dakota. Length, 50 miles.

Devil's Law-Case, The. A romantic comedy by Webster, printed in 1623.

Those who attain on earth to the first, second, or third dhyanas or stages of ecstatic meditation, are reborn in the lower of these worlds, there being united to each grade of dhyana. Those who attain the fourth enter the tenth and eleventh Brahmalokas. The remaining five are assigned to those who attain to the third path on earth, and who will reach Nirvana in the next existence, the third teaching that of those who will never return to this world, in whose hearts the last remnants of sensuality and malevolence being destroyed, not the least low desire or evil self or wrong feeling toward others can arise. To each of these five groups of worlds the next Vehicle assigns a special Buddha, called Dhyani Buddha. These five Buddhas correspond to the Lord our Buddha, including Gautama, and the future Buddha Maitreya see Bodhisattvas. Each of these human Buddhas has his corresponding Bodhisattva and Dhyani Buddha. The latter, the Bodhisattvas, and Saviors counterparts, the mystic world, rise from the debasing conditions of the material life. The material Buddha is only the emanation of a Dhyani Buddha living in the ethereal mansions of mystic trance.

She was a member of a noble family of Dauphiné, and married (1-32) Louis de Brézé, grand seneschal of Normandy, who died in 1533.

Diana of Versailles, A celebrated Greek statue in the Louvre, Paris, commonly regarded as a companion piece to the Apollo Belvedere, though inferior in execution. The goddess is advancing, clad in the short Dorian tunic and himation girded at her waist; she looks toward the right, as with raised arm she takes an arrow from her quiver.

Diana, with her Nymphs. A painting by Domenichino, in the Palazzo Barberini, Rome. The goddess stands in the middle, with bow and quiver; one nymph has just transfixed a pigeon raised as a mark on a pole; others bear in a dead stag. There is great variety in the attitudes and motives, and the landscape background is pleasing.

Dias, Antonio Gonçalves. See Gonçalves Dias.

Dias (dē'äs), Bartholomeu. Born about 1445; died May 12 (?), 1500. A Portuguese navigator. He was a gentleman of the royal household, and in 1486 was made commander of one of two small vessels (Infante commanding the other) destined to explore the coast of Africa. They passed Cape Negro, the farthest point attained by Diego Cam; followed the coast to lat. 29° S.; never caught sight of the open sea; then were driven by a freezing gravity from cold; turned eastward in search of land, and, not finding it, bore to the south, striking the west end of the Cape of Good Hope, and then came to a point beyond Algoa Bay. The sailors refused to go further; and, after taking possession of the land for Portugal, they turned around the cape and reached Lisbon in safety. Some accounts say that Dias was driven beyond the cape by a storm without observing it: in any case, he and his companions were the first to double the south end of Africa. In 1498 Dias sailed with the expedition of Gama, but remained trading on the West African coast. In 1500 he commanded a ship in Cabral's fleet, and was lost in a storm off the Cape de Boadilla.

Diaz (dē'äs), Porfirio. Born in Oaxaca, Sept. 15, 1830. A Mexican general and statesman. He served as a soldier in the war with the United States in 1847, led a battalion against Santa Anna in 1854, and in 1855 assisted to thrust and the liberal party. In 1861 he was a deputy, but soon took the field and won a victory over the reactionist Marquez. During the French invasion he was one of the leaders of the defense, was captured at Puebla May 1863, but escaped and headed the army of resistance in Oaxaca. Forced to surrender, May, 1865, he again escaped and raised new forces. After the withdrawal of the French he defeated Almonte, and, ground against Maximilian's generals, taking Puebla April 2, 1867, and finally entering Mexico June 21, 1867. Soon after he was a candidate for the presidency, but Juarez was elected. General Diaz kept up a continual opposition to Juarez and his successor, Lerdo, and headed several revolts. In 1876 he finally overthrew Lerdo, and in May, 1870, became president of Mexico. He quickly restored order and started an era of prosperity for the country. Not being by the constitution eligible to immediate reelection, he was succeeded by his friend General Gonzales in Dec., 1880. He was again elected in 1884, and reelected in 1888 and 1892, the constitution having been amended to permit this.

Diderot (dēd-drō'), Denis. Born at Langres, Haute-Marne, France, Oct. 5, 1713; died at Paris, July 31, 1784. A celebrated French philosopher and writer. His father, a cutler by trade, gave him a classical education. After completing his studies in Paris, he spent two years in a law office, but devoted most of his time to Greek, Latin, and the English, Italian, and English. Thereby he incurred his father's displeasure, and was cut off without a cent. He gave lessons in mathematics, and when at the lowest ebb of fortune in 1743, married. His literary labors date from this same period. In 1745 he published "Histoire de la Grèce" (1743–), translated from Temple Stanyan, and in 1746–48 "Dictionnaire universel de médecine, de chimie de botanique," etc. (6 vols.), translated with the aid of three collaborators from Robert James. This latter publication gave him the idea of the great work, in which he associated with himself the mathematician d'Alembert, "L'Encyclopédie," a repository of the results of scientific research and intellectual activity of the century. The publication was repeatedly checked in its progress, and was carried over more than twenty years (1751–72). To the twenty-eight volumes published within that period were joined six volumes of addenda (1776–77), and two volumes of tables (1780). Diderot received financial support from Catherine II. of Russia, who bought his valuable library but left him the use of it during his lifetime. He went to St. Petersburg in 1773–74, to return thanks to the "northern semiramis." Among his works are "Pensées philosophiques" (1746), "Lettre sur les aveugles à l'usage de ceux qui voient" (1749), "Bijoux indiscrets" (1748), "Mémoire sur différents sujets de mathématiques" (1748), "Lettre sur les aveugles à l'usage de ceux qui voient" (1749), "Le fils naturel" (1757), "Le père de famille" (1758), "Entretien d'un père avec ses enfants" (1773), "Les deux amis de Bourbonne" (1770), "Voyage en Hollande," "Projet d'une université pour la Russie," "Le rêve de d'Alembert," "Jacques le fataliste," "La religieuse," "Le Neveu de Rameau," "Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron (1778 and 1782, etc. Diderot's art criticisms in the "Salons" (1759–69) are of supreme merit, and his correspondence with Mademoiselle Volland affords the best available insight into the character of the writer's genius.

Diderot ranks in point of originality and versatility of thought among the most fertile thinkers of France, and in point of felicity and idiosyncrasy of expression among the most remarkable of her writers.

Stanley, French Lit. p. 481.

Didius Salvius Julianus (did'i-us sal'vi-us jū-li-ā'nus), Marcus, called later Marcus Didius Commodus Severus Julianus. Died at Rome, June 1, 193 A. D. Emperor of Rome March–June, 193. He served with distinction in the army, and twice held the consulship, the last time in 170 on the marriage of the emperor Commodus to the pretorian guards. He, the guards and the senate did away with Pertinax, who had made himself emperor, and their father-in-law of Pertinax. He elevation was not recognized by Septimius Severus, who marched with an army against Rome, whereupon the pretorian guards hastened to purchase the favor of Severus by putting the emperor to death.

Dido (dī'dō), [Gr. Δίδω.] A surname of the Phœnician goddess of the moon, Astarte, who was worshipped as the protecting deity of the citadel of Carthage. The goddess was in later time confounded with the Tyrian Elissa, founder of Carthage. Dyer, Rome.

Dido, Queen of Carthage, The Tragedy of. A tragedy by Marlowe, published in 1594. Nashe is said to have finished it after Marlowe's death. Dido has been the subject of many plays in English and in French — as early as Jodelle in 1552. In Gringo in 1758, Hedyn in 1693, Soulary in 1856, and Grosse in 1734. Chiabrera, Metastasio, Purcell, and Spanish poet of the 18th century, and Metastasio in Italian, also wrote tragedies on the subject. See Didone.

My own opinion is, that the play is in the main by Marlowe, and that Nashe's work was limited to completing certain scenes which Marlowe had sketched in the rough.

Dies Iræ (dī'ēz ī'rē). [L., 'day of wrath.'] A sequence appointed in the Roman missal to be sung between the Epistle and the Gospel in masses for the dead; named from its first words. It was written probably by Thomas de Celano, the friend of saint Francis of Assisi, and is a hymn in triple rimed stanzas. It subject is the day of judgment. The transition from the terror of the day of wrath (dies iræ) to hope in salvation is used "as a natural preparation to the concluding prayer for eternal rest." Sir Walter Scott's translation in "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," beginning "O day of wrath, O dreadful day," is well known. There have been numerous versions and translations. The author of the old ecclesiastical melody to which it is sung is not known, but it was adapted to the words at the time they were written. It has been a popular subject with modern composers, notably Colonna, Bassani, Cherubini, Berlioz, Verdi, and Gounod in "Mors et Vita." It is also introduced with magnificent effect in Mozart's "Requiem." Grove.

This old Latin chant was accepted by the Roman Church as one of the sequentiæ of the requiem before the year 1085. The original text is engraved upon a marble tablet in the Church of St. Francesco in Matrice. The present form of the chant is supposed to have been given by Felix Humanelius on the early part of the 15th century), who omitted the former opening stanza, and added some others at the close. In this form it is appointed in the Catholic missals since the Council of Trent. The chant has been translated upwards of seventy times into German, and fifteen times into English. Out of the many versions, of the few in which the feminine rhymes are retained, is that of Gen. John A. Dix. Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Dimetian Code (di-mē'shi-an kōd). See extract on following page.

Dimetian Code The custom (that the youngest child should have the dwelling-house when the property came to division) appears in Wales in what was probably its most primitive form. According to the laws of Hoel the Good dating from the tenth century at least, the inheritance was to be so divided that the homestead, with eight acres of land and the best implements of the household, should fall to the youngest son. The different editions of these laws are contained in the Bibliotheca Cambro-Britannica, and in the Venedotian Code for "Gwynedd" or the northern parts of the principality.

Dingwall (ding'wal). The capital of Ross-shire, situated on Cromarty Firth 11 miles northwest of Inverness. Population (1891), 2,283.

Dinias and Dercyllis (din'i-as and der-sil'is). The chief characters of an old Greek novel entitled "Of the incredible Things in Thule."

The book called "Wonders beyond Thule" was written by one Antonius Diogenes, who probably lived in Syria in the second century. Nothing more is known of him except what Photius that the work was written soon after the death of Alexander the Great. It was current as late as the 9th century, when its contents and volumes were summarized by the Patriarch Photius, who considered the work, of nearly three hundred authors into one volume to beguile the tedium of a residence in Bagdad. Our knowledge of the novel is almost entirely from this epitome and partly from the fragments which can be gathered from the later classical writings. The plot turns on the loves and adventures of a Syrian maiden and Dinias, a traveller from Arcadia, the story of whose lives was recorded in a manuscript which Alexander the Great was supposed to find in their tomb.

Dibdin, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 78.

Dinka (din'kä), a great Nigritic tribe dwelling on both sides of the White Nile between lat. 9° and 12° north latitude. Their territory is vast and fertile plain covering 60,000 square miles. They differ from the Shilluk and Nuer (with whom they largely intermarry, but whom they hate) by their higher stature, finer and more handsome bronze black, almost bluish, complexion. They are intelligent, skilful in the making of household articles, and frugal. Like the Shilluk they are both cattle-breeders and tillers of the land. Each village is headed by a chief who has little authority and recognizes no suzerain. The Dinka language is said to be related to that of the Bari, but to be entirely unlike the Bantu tongues.

Dinkard (din-kärd'). [Pahlavi: properly Dēnakarīd, the deeds or enactments of the religion.] The largest and most important Pahlavi work in existence, containing a vast amount of information regarding the legends, writings, doctrines, and customs of the Zoroastrian religion. In its present state much of the work consists of a descriptive catalogue of the contents of the original compilation, interspersed with extracts in detail. The date of its latest revision must have been subsequent to the Mohammedan conquest of Persia.

Dinkelsbühl (dink'els-bül). A small town in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Wörnitz 44 miles southwest of Nuremberg. It was formerly a free imperial city.

Dinmont (din'mont), Dandie (Andrew). A Border farmer in Sir Walter Scott's novel "Guy Mannering": the grateful friend of Brown, the lawyer, and saved his life. Sent by Meg Merrilies, he protects Brown in the Portanferry jail, and after their escape helps him, under the guidance of Meg, to capture Hatteraick. He is the owner of Mustard and Pepper, the progenitors of the Dandie Dinmont terriers.

According to Mr. Shortreed, this good man (Willie Elliot) of Millburnholm was the great original of Dandie Dinmont. As he seems to have been the first of these upland sheep-farmers who ever visited Edinburgh, so little doubt that he sat for some parts of that humorous portraiture; and it is certain that the James Davidson to excavations, the delivery of bonds to his guests, and whose thoroughbred deathbed scene is told in the Notes to Guy Mannering, was first perched on to Scott by Mr. Shortreed himself, several years after the novel had established the name celebrity all over the Borders: some accidental report about his bull-terriers, and their odd names, having alone been turned to account in the original edition of the novel. But I have the best reason to believe that the kind and manly character of Dandie, the gentle and delicious one of his wife, and some at least of the most picturesque peculiarities of the manner and Charlieshope, were filled up from Scott's observations, years after this period, of Liddly with one of whose members he had, through the best part of his life, a close and affectionate connexion. To those who were familiar with him, I have perhaps already sufficiently indicated the early home of his dear friend, William Laidlaw, namely, Tushielaw.

Lockhart, Life of Scott, I. 117.

Dinocrates (dī-nok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Δεινοκράτης.] The ablest of the architects of Alexander the Great. He planned the new city of Alexandria, and rebuilt the Artemisium of Ephesus after its destruction by fire. This architect appears under eight different names given by Brunn.

Dinorah (dē-nō'rä). The original Italian title of an opera by Meyerbeer, first produced at Paris as "Le pardon de Ploërmel," April 4, 1859.

Dinter (din'ter), Friedrich. Born at Borna, Saxony, Feb. 29, 1760; died at Königsberg, Prussia, May 29, 1831. A German writer on pedagogics, professor of theology at Königsberg from 1822. His chief work is the "Schulbibliothek."

Dinwiddie (din'wid-i), Robert. Born in Scotland about 1690; died at Clifton, England, Aug. 3, 1770. A British official, lieutenant-governor of Virginia 1752–58, appointed by the crown, recommending the annexation of the Ohio Valley and the erection of forts to resist the encroachments of the French. In 1753 he despatched George Washington to the French forts on the Ohio, and Allegheny to frustrate with their commanders the claim to possession of British territory, and was subsequently one of the most strenuous supporters of the old French and Indian war.

Diocles (dī'ō-klēz). [Gr. Διοκλῆς.] A Syracusan popular leader, the reputed (chief) author of a code of laws named for him.

Diocles Carystius (of Carystus'). A celebrated Greek physician of the 4th century B. C., born at Carystus in Eubœa.

Diocletian (dī-o-klē'shi-an) (Caius Aurelius Valerius Diocletianus; surnamed Jovius). Born at Diocles (whence his name), Dalmatia, 245 A. D.; died near Salona, Dalmatia, 313. Emperor of Rome. He entered the army at an early age, and, although of humble origin, rose by successful commands under Probus, Aurelian, and Carus. On the death of Numerianus, joint emperor with Carinus, he was proclaimed emperor at Nicomedia on Sept. 17, 284, and advanced against Carinus, who was killed by some of his own officers. In 286 he adopted Maximian as his colleague in the government. In 292 the joint emperors appointed Galerius and Constantius Chlorus Cæsars respectively. Diocletian and Maximian retired in the 10th of August, while Galerius and Constantius were elevated to the rank of Augusti. Each of the Cæsars was assigned in the local administration of his provinces, but the three junior rulers acknowledged Diocletian as the head of the empire. The empire was divided among the four fellows: Diocletian received Thrace, Egypt, Syria, and Asia, with Nicomedia as his capital; Maximian Italy, Africa, Sicily, and the islands of the Mediterranean, with Milan as his capital; Galerius, Illyricum and the countries of the Danube, with Sirmium as his capital; and Constantius, Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treves as his capital. Diocletian subdued a revolt in Egypt in 296. Constantius restored the allegiance of Britain in the same year, and Galerius forced the Persians to sue for peace in 297. In 303 Diocletian, persuaded by Galerius to issue the persecutions of Galerius, ordered a general persecution of the Christians throughout the empire. He abdicated in 305, compelling Maximian to do the same, and presided at the assembly in which Severus and Maximinus Daia were elevated to the rank of Augusti, with Constantius and Galerius, who in turn appointed Severus and Maximinus Cæsars.

Diocletian inaugurated . . . the period of the Patriarchian Emperors. Himself borne to power by something not very unlike a mutiny of the troops on the Persian frontier, he nevertheless regarded with a deep veneration the passionate longing of the world that the age of mutines might cease. With this intention he remodelled the internal constitution of the state and moulded it into a bureaucracy so strong, so stable, so wisely organised, that it subsisted virtually the same for more than a thousand years, and by its endurance prolonged for many ages the duration of the Byzantine Empire.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 15.

Diocletian, Baths of. Baths in ancient Rome founded by Maximian at the junction of the Quirinal and Viminal hills, and dedicated 305–306 A. D. A plan was made in 1700 by the architect Fontana, but the remains then existing were not uncovered in any considerable quantity, and upon the splendid foundation now the church of Sta. Maria degli Angeli, and one of the finest halls which occupied the angles, now the Museo Kircheriano.

Diodati (dē-ō-dä'tē), Domenico. Born at Naples, 1736; died at Naples, 1801. An Italian archæologist. His works include "De Christo graece loquente exercitatio" (1767), etc.

Diodati, Giovanni. Born at Geneva, June 6, 1576; died at Geneva, Oct. 3, 1649. A Swiss Protestant theologian, professor of Hebrew and later of theology at Geneva. He translated the Bible into Italian (1607).

Diodorus (dī-o-dō'rus), surnamed Siculus ('of Sicily'). [Gr. Διόδωρος.] Born at Agyrium, Sicily: lived in the second half of the 1st century B. C. A Greek historian, author of a history in 40 books entitled a "Historical Library" (Βιβλιοθήκη). See the extracts.

The history . . . of Diodorus consisted of forty books, divided into three great sections. The first of these sections, comprising the mythical period down to the taking of Troy, which he places with Apollodorus ten years before the commencement of the Olympiads, i. e. B.C. 1184, ran up to the end of the fifth book. The second section, from the sixth to the eighteenth book, contained the middle and best part of the history, the taking of Troy to the death of Alexander the Great. The third period, occupying the twenty-three remaining books, carries the history down to the battle of Actium, and Julius Cæsar's conquest of Britain. Of these books we have the first five complete, fragments of books 1–5, containing the history of the Egyptians, Assyrians, Ethiopians, and Greeks; and books 11–20, containing the period from the conquest of Xerxes down to the year B. C. 302. The rest of the work is either lost altogether, or represented only by a series of fragments and extracts, of which the most considerable refer to books xx–xl. The following is a general analysis of the remnants of Diodorus:—Book I. On Egypt; its mythology, geography, and history; its laws, literature, and customs; and the Greeks who have travelled in the country. II. The legendary history of Assyria, from Ninus to Sardanapalus; the Medes, Chaldæans, Indians, Scythians, Hyperboreans, Arabians, with an account of the Island of Ceylon. III. On the Æthiopians, and other nations of Libya. IV. The mythology of Greece. V. On the Greek Islands and the Phœnician settlements in the Mediterranean. He also treats of the islands of the Atlantic, and of Arabia and its seas. XI. From the invasion of Xerxes (Ol. 75, 1) down to the war of Cyprus (Ol. 82, 2), with contemporary notices of Sicily, Egypt and Rome. XII. From the war of Cyprus (Ol. 82, 2) to that of Syracuse (Ol. 93, 1), with notices of the affairs of Macedonia, and Lacedæmon, and the Decemvirate at Rome. XIII. From the war between Syracuse and Athens (Ol. 92, 2) down to that between Syracuse and the Carthaginians (Ol. 96, 4). XIV. From the time of the last book to that (Ol. 100, 4) to the taking of Rome by the Gauls (Ol. 98, 3). XV. From the war between Artaxerxes and Evagoras (Ol. 98, 2) to the accession of Philip (Ol. 106, 2). XVI. Reign of Philip of Macedon. XVII. Reign of Alexander the Great. XVIII. Successors of Alexander down to the domination of Agathocles in Sicily (Ol. 117, 2). XIX. Affairs of Greece, Sicily, and Italy down to the battle of Himera (Ol. 117, 2). XX. From the war of Agathocles in Sicily (Ol. 117, 3) down to the coalition against Antigonus (Ol. 119, 3).

Diogenes (dī-oj′e-nēz). [Gr. Διογένης.] Born at Sinope, Asia Minor, about 412 B. C.: died at Corinth, 323. A Greek Cynic philosopher, famous for his eccentricities. He emigrated to Athens in his youth, became the pupil of Antisthenes, and lived, according to Seneca, in a tub. While on a voyage from Athens to Ægina, he was captured by pirates who expressed him for sale on the slave-market in Crete. When asked what business he understood, he replied, "How to command men," and requested to be sold to some one in need of a master. He was purchased by Xeniades, a wealthy citizen of Corinth, who employed him as tutor, and in whose house he passed his old age. At Corinth he was, according to tradition, visited by Alexander the Great. Alexander inquired whether he could oblige him in any way. "Yes," replied Diogenes; "stand from between me and the sun.

Diogenes, Antonius. The author of the romance "Dinias and Dercyllis" (which see).

Diogenes Laertius (lā-ėr′shi-us). [The surname Λαέρτιος or Λαερτεύς is probably from his birthplace (?) Laerte in Cilicia.] Lived probably about 200 A. D. A historian and biographer, author of lives of the Greek philosophers in 10 books, from the early schools to the Epicureans. His work is chiefly valued as containing information preserved nowhere else.

Diogenes of Apollonia. Born at Apollonia, Crete: lived in the 5th century B. C. A Greek natural philosopher, a pupil of Anaximenes.

Diomed (dī′ō-med). See Diomedes.

Diomed. A chestnut thoroughbred horse, foaled in 1777, by Florizel, dam by Spectator, second dam Blank, third dam Old Childers. Placed by Hero traces directly to Byerly Turk. Diomed won the first Derby in 1780, and died in 1807. He was the sire of Bonne, sire of American Eclipse, also the sire of Sir Archy, sire of Timoleon, etc., of Boston, sired Lexington.

Diomed, Villa of. See Pompeii.

Diomede Islands (dī′o-mēd i′landz). A group of small islands in Bering Strait.

Diomedes (dī-ō-mē′dēz). [Gr. Διομήδης.] 1. In Greek legend, a king of Argos, and one of the most famous of the Greek warriors at the siege of Troy. He was the son of Tydeus who fell in the expedition against Thebes. He went with Sthenelus and Eurydus to Troy as the commander of a fleet of 80 ships carrying warriors from Argos, Tiryns, Hermione, Asine, Troezene, Eione, Epidaurus, Ægina and Masses. He was, next to Achilles, the bravest of the Greeks before Troy, and fought with the most distinguished among the Trojans, including Hector and Æneas.

2. A legendary Thracian king, son of Ares.—3. In Shakspere's "Antony and Cleopatra," an attendant of Cleopatra.—4. In Shakspere's "Troilus and Cressida," a Grecian commander.

Dion (dī′on). [Gr. Δίων.] Born at Syracuse, about 408 B. C.: assassinated at Syracuse, 354 or 353 B. C. A Syracusan philosopher, a disciple of Plato. He expelled Dionysius the Younger from Syracuse in 356, and became ruler of the city in 355.

Dion. 1. A Sicilian noble in Shakspere's "Winter's Tale."—2. The father of Euphrasia in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Philaster."

Dion Cassius (kash′i-us), surnamed Cocceianus (from some person named Cocceius or Cocceianus, perhaps his grandfather). Born at Nicæa, Bithynia, about 155 A. D.: died at Nicæa, after 230. A celebrated historian of Rome. He was consul about 220 and 229, and wrote in Greek a history of Rome in 80 books. See the extract.

The great work of Dion Cassius was a history of Rome . . . from the foundation of the city to the year A. D. 229, besides this, a number of works, now lost or incorporated in his history, are attributed to him by Suidas and others. The history consisted of eighty books, of which Books XXXVII.–XL. have come down to us complete or nearly so, the remainder of the work being represented by fragments of different kinds. In the 10th century, when the whole work was in existence, excerpts were made from it by the order of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and in the 12th century Zonaras undertook an abridgment of the first 20 books, which, with those from the 36th book to the end, were then extant. The latter part of the work, from the 60th to the 80th book, had been abridged in the 11th century by a monk named Joannes Xiphilinus. There are detached fragments, more or less considerable, of the 36th and 36th books, referring to the campaign of Lucullus against Mithridates, and Pompey's war with the pirates. On the other hand, there are many gaps in the 37th, 55th, 56th, 57th, 58th, 59th, and 60th books. The work was continued down to the time of Constantine the Great by some Christian writer, who is supposed to have been Joannes Antiochenus.

Dion Chrysostomus (kri-sos′tō-mus). [Gr. Χρυσόστομος.] Born at Prusa, Bithynia, about 50 A. D.: died at Rome about 117. A Greek rhetorician and philosopher. His 80 extant orations were edited by Reiske 1784.

Dione (dī-ō′ne). [Gr. Διώνη.] 1. In Greek mythology, a female Titan, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and mother by Zeus of Aphrodite.—2. A pastoral tragedy by John Gay, published in 1720.—3. The fourth satellite of Saturn, discovered by Cassini, March, 1684.

Dionysia (dī-ō-nis′i-ä). [Gr. Διονύσια.] Ancient Greek festivals in honor of Dionysus, of these, those of Athens were the most important, and are generally held to have been four in number: the Lesser or Rural Dionysia, the Lenæa, the Anthesteria, and the Greater or City Dionysia. It now seems proved, however, that the Lenæa and the Anthesteria were, in historic times at least, not Dionysiac festivals, but indigenous names for the festival which centered about the Lenæum, or sanctuary of Dionysus in the Marshes, whose shrine was opened only once in the year. The date of this festival was from the 11th to the 13th of Anthesterion (about March 2–4). The Lesser Dionysia were a wine-feast of very early origin, held throughout the Attic demes between the 11th and 13th of Poseideon (about Dec. 23), accompanied by drinking, boisterous processions, and dramatic performances, of which those at the Piræus had the chief reputation. The Greater Dionysia were celebrated in Athens, probably from the 9th to the 13th of Elaphebolion (about March 28–April 2). On the first day there was a grand procession and a feast, besides a choral dance around the Altar of the Twelve Gods in the Agora; on the second day were held lyrical contests between choruses of boys and men; and on the last three days dramatic contests in the Dionysiac theater.

Dionysius (dī-o-nish′i-us), surnamed "The Elder." [Gr. Διονύσιος, from Διώνυσος, Dionysus: the name has become Denis (which see).] Born about 430 B. C.: died at Syracuse, 367. Tyrant of Syracuse. He contrived in 406 to have himself appointed general with full powers of the republic in the war against Carthage, whereupon he surrounded himself with a strong body-guard of mercenaries and usurped the government. He strengthened his position by marrying the daughter of the deposed party leader Hermocrates, and concluded peace with Carthage in 404. He declared war against Carthage in 397, and was besieged in 396 in Syracuse by the Carthaginians. Who were compelled by pestilence and a successful sally of the Syracusans to raise the siege after an investment of eleven months. He concluded advantageous peace in 392, and captured Rhegium in 387, and Croton in 379, which gave him a commanding influence among the Italian Greeks. His power and influence are said to have exceeded those of any other Greek before Alexander the Great. He encouraged letters, invited Plato to his court, and himself gained the chief prize at the Lenæa with a play entitled "The Rhapsodist" or "Rector."

Dionysius, surnamed "The Younger." Born about 395 B. C.: died at Corinth (?) after 343. Tyrant of Syracuse, a relative of Dion, and son of Dionysius the Elder whom he succeeded in 367. He was expelled in 356, restored in 346, and finally expelled in 343.

Dionysius, Saint. Born at Alexandria in the last part of the 2d century A. D.: died at Alexandria, 265. A theologian, called "the Great," bishop of Alexandria about 247. He was converted by Origen. Only fragments of his works remain.

Dionysius, Pg. Diniz. Born at Lisbon, Oct. 9, 1261: died at Santarem, Portugal, Jan. 7, 1325. King of Portugal 1279–1325. He founded the University of Coimbra.

Dionysius Exiguus (eks-ig′ū-us). [L., 'the Little.'] Born in Scythia: lived in the 6th century A. D. A monk and scholar of the Western Church who, in his "Cyclus paschalis," introduced the annunciation of the birth of Christ as the starting-point of modern chronology, thus establishing the Christian or Dionysian era. He placed the birth of Christ from three to six years too late.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus. Born at Halicarnassus, Caria: died at Rome about 7 B. C. A Greek rhetorician and historian, author of a history of Rome (Archæologia).

Dionysius of Halicarnassus (25 B. C.), in his Archæology, i. e. Early History, of Rome to 264 B. C., aimed at writing an Introduction to Polybius. He maintains, on fanciful grounds, that the Romans, who deserve to rule the world, are no "barbarians," but of Greek descent. We have Books I.–X., going down to 450 B. C., and fragments of Book XI. He did a better work in his rhetorical writings, and above all in his excellent essays on the Greek orators. Webb, Greek Lit., p. 148.

Dionysius Periegetes (per′i-ē-jē′tēz). [Gr. Περιηγήτης, a guide, cicerone, or showman: so named from the title of his book. See the def.] Lived about the 4th (1st?) century A. D. The author of a geographical poem, "Periegesis" (Gr. Περιήγησις τῆς γῆς, a geographical description of the earth).

Dionysius the Areopagite. An Athenian, a member of the Areopagus, converted by St. Paul about 50 A. D. He became the reputed author of several Greek treatises ("The Celestial Hierarchy," "The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy," "Concerning the Names of God," "Of Mystical Theology," "Epistles," and a Liturgy) which appeared in the 6th century and were probably written in the 5th. They have been the subject of much theological and critical discussion.

Dionysus (dī-ō-nī′sus). [Gr. Διόνυσος or Διώνυσος.] In Greek mythology, the god of wine. He was, according to the common tradition, the son of Zeus and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes. Hera, jealous of the attention which Zeus bestowed on Semele, persuaded her in the guise of a friendly old woman to request him to approach her in the same majesty in which he approached his wife. Zeus appeared in thunder and lightning, with the result that Semele in her fright gave birth to Dionysus, whom Zeus rescued from the flames and sewed up in his thigh until he came to maturity. He was brought up by Ino and Athamas at Orchomenos; spent many years in wandering through the earth, introducing the cultivation of the vine; and eventually rose into Olympus. He was also called, both by the Greeks and the Romans, Bacchus, a name of obscure origin, which was originally a surname of Dionysus.

Dionyza (dī-ō-nī′zä). In Shakspere's "Pericles," the wife of Cleon, governor of Tharsus. She attempts the murder of Marina, and with her husband is burned to death in revenge.

Diophantus (dī-ō-fan′tus). [Gr. Διόφαντος.] Lived at Alexandria, probably in the 4th century A. D. A Greek mathematician, reputed inventor of algebra. His chief work is "Arithmetica" (edited by Fermat, 1670).

Dioscorides (dī′os-kor′i-dēz). Pedacius (pe-dā′shi-us) or Pedanius (pe-dā′ni-us). [Gr. Διοσκορίδης, surnamed Πεδάνιος or Πεδάνιος.] Born probably at Anazarba, Cilicia: lived in the 1st or 2d century A. D. A Greek physician, author of a treatise on materia medica.

Dioscuri (dī-os-kū′ri). [Gr. Διόσκουροι.] Castor and Pollux, according to Greek legends the sons of Leda and Zeus, or of Leda and Tyndareus (whence their patronymic Tyndaridæ), and brothers of Helen. See Castor and Pollux.

Dioscurus (dī-os-kū′rus). Died at Gangra, Paphlagonia, 454. Bishop of Alexandria 444–451. Having sided with the heretic Eutyches against Flavian, bishop of Constantinople, he convoked a synod at Ephesus in 449, which sustained the former and condemned the latter. This synod, over which he presided, was conducted with so much violence that it was stigmatized as the "Robber Synod." He was condemned and deposed by the Ecumenical Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Diospolis. Thebes in Egypt: hence, Diospolite dynasty, a Theban dynasty. See Thebes.

Diotima (dī-ō-ti′mä). [Gr. Διοτίμα.] A priestess of Mantinea, the reputed teacher of Socrates, mentioned in Plato's "Symposium." She is probably fictitious.

Diphda (dif′dä). [Ar. difdá' al-thání, the second frog, the star Fomalhaut being the first.] An often used name for the star β Ceti. Also called Deneb Kaitos.

Diphilus (dif′i-lus). [Gr. Δίφιλος.] Born at Sinope. One of the chief Athenian poets of the New Comedy, a contemporary of Menander. He is said to have exhibited a hundred plays. Fragments of his works are extant.

Diplonacy. A play subtitled by Bolton and Savile Rowe from Sardou's "Dora," produced in 1878.

Dippel (dip′pel), Johann Konrad. Born at Frankenstein, near Darmstadt, Germany, Aug. 10, 1673: died at Berleburg, Prussia, April 25, 1734. A German mystic and alchemist. He invented Dippel's animal oil, and discovered Prussian blue.

Dipsodes (dip′sōdz). The. [Gr. δυψάω, thirsty.] A people in Rabelais's "Gargantua and Pantagruel." They were ruled by King Anarche, and many of them were giants. Pantagruel subdued them.

Dipylon Gate (dip'i-lon gāt), The. [Gr. dίπυλον, double-gated.] The chief gateway of ancient Athens, traversing the walls on the northwest side. As its name indicates, it was in fact a double gate, consisting of a strongly fortified rectangular court between two gateways, each portal of which in itself was double, having two doors, each 11½ feet wide, separated by a central pier. The foundations of this gate alone among those of ancient Athens, survive in great part, and from it toward the southwest extends a beautiful stretch of the original wall of Themistocles, built under Peloponnesian menace after the Greek victories over the Persians in 480 and 479 B. C. This wall, in its conformity, construction of admirably fitted blocks and rough stones, confirms literary witness to the haste of work spurred on by emergency. The Dipylon is identical with the Sacred Gate, and among the roads diverging from it is the sacred Way to Eleusis. It was long held that an opening in the wall immediately southwest of the Dipylon was the Sacred Gate, but Dörpfeld has shown that this was a passage for the stream which he identifies as the Eridanus.

Diræ (dī'rē). The Furies (which see).

Dirce (dėr'sē). [Gr. Δίρκη.] In Greek mythology, the second wife of Lycus, put to death by Amphion and Zethus, sons of Antiope, as revenge for her ill treatment of their mother. See Antiope. She was bound to the horns of a bull and dragged to death. Her execution is represented in the famous group "Farnese Bull" (which see). Her body was placed by Dionysus in a well on Mount Cithæron.

Directory, The. The body of five men who held the executive power in France from Oct. 26, 1795, to the coup d'état of 1799 (18th Brumaire, Nov. 9). It succeeded the Convention. During this period occurred the campaigns of Napoleon in Italy and Egypt and other campaigns in Germany, etc.; French influence became powerful in Italy and Switzerland; the treaty of Campo-Formio was concluded with Austria in the presence of Napoleon; and a war with the United States. The personnel of the Directory was modified by coup d'état, 18th Fructidor (sept. 4, 1797, in which the republicans triumphed over the reactionaries. Toward the close of its term the Directory became discredited by defeats in Italy, and was overthrown by Napoleon and succeeded by the Consulate. See Bonaparte.

Dirschau (dēr'shou), Pol. Szczewo (shchē'vō). A town in the province of West Prussia, Prussia, situated on the Vistula 19 miles southeast of Danzig. It has a notable lattice-work iron bridge. Population (1890), 11,541.

Dis (dis). In Roman mythology, a name of Pluto, and hence of the lower world.

Disco (dis'kō). An island belonging to Denmark, situated in Baffin Bay, west of Greenland, in lat. 69° 30′ N. It contains the harbor of Godhavn.

Disco Bay. A bay on the west coast of Greenland, southeast of Disco Island.

Discobolus (dis-kob'ō-lus). [Gr. δισκο-βόλος, thrower of the discus.] An antique copy, in the Vatican, Rome, of a famous statue by Myron. The body is bent forward and turned toward the right arm, the head is turned backward, the discus being shown in the choice and suppression of the moment of repose when, the backward motion completed, the powerful cast forward is on the point of execution.

Discordia (dis-kōr'di-ä). In Roman mythology, the goddess of dissension, corresponding to the Greek Eris.

Discours de la méthode. See Descartes.

Discoveries, The. A sort of commonplace-book of aphorisms produced by Ben Jonson from his daily reading.

Discovery, The. A small ship which, under command of Captain George Waymouth, was sent out by the Muscovy Company to "find the passage best to lye towards the parts or kingdom of Cataya or China, or the backside of America." She sailed with the Godspeed from the Thames May 2, 1602, intending to make the coast of Greenland; but adverse weather had a lucky result, though it probably paved the way for Hudson's discovery. In April, 1610, the latter sailed in the Discovery, and entered the strait which bears his name in June. Early in August he entered Hudson Bay. He spent three months in exploring it, and in November the vessel was frozen in. In June of the following year she was released, and shortly after a mutiny occurred. Hudson and others were set adrift, and were never again seen. The Discovery was taken home by the mutineers, and two years after this she was again sent to the Northwest with the Resolution under command of Sir Thomas Button. He discovered Nelson's River, which he called Port Nelson, and several points. In 1615 the Discovery set out with William Baffin and Robert Bylot, and again in 1616. In both these voyages many important discoveries and explorations were made. See Hudson, Henry.

Disentis, or Dissentis (dēs'en-tis). A village in the canton of Grisons, Switzerland, situated on the Further Rhine 35 miles southeast of Lucerne. It is noted for its Benedictine abbey, founded about 614, from which it received the name Muster (L. Monasterium.)

Dismal Swamp, Great. A morass in southeastern Virginia and northeastern North Carolina. It extends from near Norfolk 30 to 40 miles southward. It contains Lake Drummond, and is traversed by the Dismal Swamp canal, which connects Chesapeake Bay and Albemarle Sound. Part of the swamp has been reclaimed.

Disnai (dis'mas), or Desmas (des'mas). The legendary name of the penitent thief crucified with Christ.

Dismissal of Hagar. See Hagar, Dismissal of.

Disowned, The. A novel by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1829.

Disraeli (diz-rā'li or diz-rē'li), Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield. Born at London, Dec. 21, 1804; died at London, April 19, 1881. An English statesman and novelist, son of Isaac D'Israeli. He entered the House of Commons in 1837, and became one of the leaders of the Young England party, and leader of the Opposite to Sir Robert Peel in the House in 1846, and 1850–52. He was chancellor of the exchequer in 1866, carried the Reform Bill of 1867; became premier in 1868, resigned in 1868; was again premier 1874–80, was created earl of Beaconsfield in 1876; and was plenipotentiary at the Congress of Berlin in 1878. His administration was noted for progressive foreign policy (as to Egypt, the Eastern question, India, and South Africa). He wrote "Vindication of the British constitution" (1835); the novels of "Vivian Grey" (1826: second part in 1827), "The Young Duke" (1831), "Contarini Fleming" (1832), "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy" (1833), "Rise of Iskander" (1834), "Revolutionary Epic" (1834), "Henrietta Temple" (1837), "Venetia" (1837), "Henrietta Temple" (1837), "Tragedy of Count Alarcos" (1839), "Coningsby" (1844), "Sybil" (1845), "Tancred" (1847), "Lord Beaconsfield's Tales and Jokes" (1849), "Lothair" (1870), "Endymion" (1880).

D'Israeli, Isaac. Born at Enfield, England, May, 1766; died at Bradenham House, Bucks, England, Jan. 19, 1848. An English miscellaneous writer. His chief works are "Curiosities of Literature" (1791–1823), "Calamities of Authors" (1812), "Quarrels of Authors" (1814), "Literary Character" (1818), "Charles I." (1828–30), "Amenities of Literature" (1841).

Dixie (dik'si). A popular name of the Southern States of the American Union. See Dixie's Land.

Dixie's Land. Said to have been originally a negro name for New York or Manhattan Island, later applied to the South. The phrase originated in New York early in the 19th century, it developed into a song, and after the Civil War became associated with obtaining the word "Dixie" or "Dixie's Land." In the south Dixie is regarded as meaning the Southern states, the word being supposed to be derived from Mason and Dixon's line, which formerly divided the free and slave states. It is there said to have first come into use when Texas joined the Union, and the capitals used of it as "Dixie."

In the popular mythology of New York City, Dixie was the Negroes paradise on earth in times when slavery and the slave-trade were flourishing in that country. Dixie owned a tract of land on Manhattan Island, and had a large number of slaves; and his slaves were treated better than his land, an imputation cast, such as has taken place in Virginia and other States. Naturally, the Negroes who left it for distant parts looked back and placed an alloyed happiness and it was their old Virginia of the Negroes of that day. Hence Dixie became synonymous with ideal locality, imparting notable happiness and every imaginable requisite of earthly existence.

Dominican Republic, often, but incorrectly, called Santo Domingo or San Domingo. [Sp. República Dominicana.] A republic occupying the eastern and larger part of the island of Santo Domingo, or Haiti, in the West Indies. It is broken by several mountain chains, and to the interior there are elevated plains (especially the Vega Real) of great fertility and beauty. The majority of the inhabitants are of mixed Spanish, Indian, and negro blood, with some of pure African descent, and comparatively few whites. Spanish is the common language, though French and English are spoken in the coast towns. Roman Catholicism is the state religion, but other cults are tolerated. Agriculture, cattle raising, and lumbering are almost the only industries. The principal exports are sugar, coffee, tobacco, hides, and cabinet woods. The republic was formed in 1844, after a revolution by which it was separated from Haiti. From 1862 to 1865 it was held by Spain. In 1869 the president (Baez) signed with President Grant a treaty of annexation with the United States, which the Senate at Washington refused to ratify. There have been various wars with Haiti, political revolutions, and changes of the constitution. By the present amended constitution (adopted 1887) the president is elected for four years by universal suffrage, and there is a national congress of 22 members elected by restricted suffrage. Domitian (dō-mish'ian) Titus Flavius Domitianus Augustus. Born at Rome, Oct. 24, 51 A. D.: died at Rome, Sept. 18, 96. Roman emperor 81–96: the second son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, and the brother of Titus whom he succeeded. He undertook a campaign against the Chatti in 83, in the course of which he began the construction of a boundary wall between the Danube and the Rhine. This wall was guarded by soldiers settled upon public lands (agri decumates) along its course. He carried on unsuccessful wars against the Dacians under Decebalus 86–90, when he purchased peace by the promise of a yearly tribute. He recalled Agricola, whose victories in Britain, 78–84, aroused his jealousy. The last years of his reign were stained by cruelty and tyranny. He was murdered by the freedman Stephanus, at the instance of the empress Domitia and several officers of the court, who were in fear of their lives.

Domitilla. In Shirley's play "The Royal Master," a girl of fifteen years who, in an innocent delusion, fixes her love upon the king, mistaking his promise to provide her with a husband for a proof of personal affection.

He was professor of architecture in University College, London, 1841–68, and emeritus professor from 1866 until his death. His works include "Pompeii" (1825), and "A Collection of the Most Approved Examples of Doorways from Ancient Buildings in Greece and Italy" (1833).

Donar (dō'när). The German form of Thor.

Donash ben Labrath (dō-näsh' ben läb-räth'). A Jewish grammarian and poet of the 10th century, native of Bagdad. He lived and wrote in Fez, and was an opponent of Menachem ben Seruk: both of them may be considered as among the earliest scientific Hebrew grammarians. Donash was the first to apply the Arabic meter to Hebrew verse.

Donatello (don-a-tel'lō) (properly Donato di Niccolo di Betto Bardi). Born at Florence about 1386: died at Florence, Dec. 13, 1466. A Florentine sculptor, one of the leading restorers of sculpture in Italy. His work may be divided into three periods: (a) That of realism (1420–34). The statues of the Campanile at Florence (including the famous Zuccone and Poggio), the St. John of the National Museum, and the bust of Niccolo da Uzzano, characterize this period. (b) That (1438–53) marked by the partnership with the sculptor-architect Michelozzo, with whose assistance he made the mausoleum of Pope John XXIII. in the Baptistery at Florence, that of Cardinal Brancacci at Naples, and that of Bartolommeo Aragazzi in the Duomo at Montepulciano, and the bas-reliefs of the pulpit at Prato. (c) That (1433–66) in which the influence of antiquity became prominently manifested, as shown in the Judith and the Cupid in bronze at the National Museum in Florence, and numerous other productions. He may be considered as the precursor of Michelangelo.

Donatello. A character in Hawthorne's "Marble Faun," a young Tuscan count whose likeness to the statue of the faun by Praxiteles gives the title to the book. He is rumored to be a descendant of an ancient faun, and is described in the romance of the tale as possessed only of the happy, spontaneous life of such creatures. He inquisitively commits murder for the sake of Miriam whom he loves, and is awakened to the higher responsibilities and life of man by his remorse in his penance.

Donati (dō-nä'tē), Giovanni Battista. Born at Pisa, Italy, Dec. 16, 1826: died at Florence, Sept. 19, 1873. A noted Italian astronomer. He discovered the comet named for him, June 2, 1858.

Donation of Constantine. A medieval forgery, of unknown date and origin, which pretends to be an imperial edict issued by Constantine the Great in 324 confirming the sovereignty of Italy and the West on the papal see. It was probably composed about the middle of the 8th century. "It tells how Constantine the Great, cured of his leprosy by the prayers of pope Sylvester, received on the fourth day from his baptism, to forsake the ancient seat of empire, and built on the Bosphorus, lest the continuance of the secular government should cramp the freedom of the spiritual, and how he bestowed this upon Sylvester and his successors the sovereignty over Italy and the countries of the West. But this is not all, although this is what historians, in addition of the splendid audacity, have chiefly dwelt upon. The edict proceeds to grant to the Roman pontiff and his clergy a series of dignities and privileges, all of them copied by the Emperor and his senate, all of them showing the same desire to make the pontifical a copy of the imperial office. The Pope is to inhabit the Lateran palace, to wear the diadem, the collar, the purple cloak, to carry the scepter, to be attended by a body of chamberlains. Similarly his clergy are to ride on white horses, and receive the honours and immunities of the senate and patricians." Dupin, Ancient Christianity.

Donatists (don'a-tists). [From Donatus the Great.] An early Christian sect in Africa which originated in a dispute over the election of Cæcilian to the see of Carthage, A. D. 311, occasioned by his opposition to the extreme reverence paid to relics of martyrs and to the sufferers in the Christian faith called confessors, and by the rivalry of Donatus, primate of Numidia. Secundus and the Numidian bishops declared Cæcilian's consecration invalid because conferred by Felix of Aptunga, whom they charged with being a traditor. They accordingly deposed Cæcilian and his party, and made one Majorinus bishop in opposition. The Donatist cause either from Donatus of Casæ Nigræ, who headed the party of Majorinus at the Lateran Council in 313, where it was condemned, or (more probably) from Donatus the Great, who succeeded Majorinus in 315, and under whom the schism became fixed. Repressed under Constantine, the Donatists revived under the favor of Julian the Apostate. Repressive measures provoked by their frequent acts of fanatical violence, were resorted to from time to time. Numerous unsuccessful schisms, the conciliatory conduct of the orthodox clergy at a conference held at Carthage in 411, and the arguments of St. Augustine combined to undermine Donatism, and the sect became insignificant, though not entirely crushed till the 7th century. The Donatist party held that it constituted the whole and only true church, and that the sacraments and ordinations of the orthodox clergy were invalid, because they were in communion with traditors. They therefore rebaptized and reordained converts from Catholicism.

Donatus (dō-nā'tus). Bishop of Casæ Nigræ during the Diocletian persecution, and leader of a party which courted martyrdom with fanatical enthusiasm, and regarded with horror the "traditors," or those who to escape their persecutors delivered up to them the sacred books. This division was the beginning of the Donatist schism, though the party was named from Donatus the Great.

Donatus, surnamed "The Great." Bishop of Carthage 315, elected by the rigorists or opponents of the moderate party or "traditors" (see Donatists) to succeed Majorinus who had been elected by them in opposition to Cæcilian, elected by the moderates and deposed by the rigorists in a council assembled at Carthage. It was for this Donatus that the Donatist party was named.

Donatus, Ælius. Lived in the middle of the 4th century A. D. A Roman grammarian and rhetorician. Of his works we possess a Latin grammar,

"Ars grammatica," a commentary on Terence, and the preface and introduction (with other fragments) of a commentary on Vergil.

The only block-book without pictures of which we have any knowledge is the Donatus (the full title of the book is Donatus de octodus partibus orationis, or Donatus on the Eight Parts of Speech. It is sometimes designated as Donatus pro puerilis, "Donatus for Little Boys"), or Boys' Latin Grammar. It received its name from its author, Ælius Donatus, a Roman grammarian of the fourth century, and one of the instructors of St. Jerome. The block-book is but an abridgment of the old grammar, as it was usually printed in the form of a thin quarto, it could with propriety be classified among pamphlets rather than with books. When printed in the largest letters, it occupied but thirty-four pages; when letters of small size were used, it was compressed within nine pages.

De Vinne, Invention of Printing, p. 254.

Donau (dō'nou). The German name of the Danube (which see).

Donaueschingen (dō'nou-esh'ing-en). A small town in the Black Forest, in Baden, 30 miles east of Freiburg, situated at the union of the Brigach and Breg. It contains the palace of the Princes of Fürstenberg.

Don Garcia de Navarre (dė nä-värʹ). A play by Molière.

It may be called Molière's only failure. He styles it a comédie héroïque, and it is in fact a kind of antiparody of Racine's manner, but applied to less serious subjects. The jealousy of the hero is, however, the only motive of the piece, and its exhibition is rather tedious than anything else. The play is monotonous and unrelieved by action.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 309.

Don Giovanni (don jō-vän'nē). An opera by Mozart, first produced at Prague Oct. 29, 1787. The words were by Da Ponte. See Don Juan.

He composed about 60 operas among which are Anna Bolena 1830, "L'Elisir d'Amore" 1832, "Lucia di Lammermoor" 1835, "La Favorita" 1840, "La Fille du Regiment," afterward "La Figlia del Reggimento" 1840, "Linda di Chamounix" 1842, and "Don Pasquale" 1843.

Don Juan (don jū'an; Sp. pron. dōn hō-än'). A partly legendary character of Spanish origin. Don Juan Tenorio, who lived in the 14th century, the son of an illustrious family of Seville, killed the commander of the Order of Calatrava, and laughed at the dead monks, wishing to put an end to the debaucharies of Don Juan, enticed him to their monastery and killed him, giving out that the statue of his victim (which had been erected there), incensed at an insult offered him on the plays he is jestingly invited to supper, had come down and dragged him to hell. Both Spanish and Italian plays of the 16th century have this subject for their introduction to the French stage. Don Juan is the type of skeptical libertinism, and as such has been made the subject of the drama "Don Juan" (1787) by Bertati (which set to music by Tellez (Tirso de Molina) (17th century); of Molière's comedy "Don Juan ou le festin de Pierre," 1665; of Mozart's opera "Don Giovanni (which see); of Byron's poem "Don Juan" (1818–24); of Grabbe's German drama "Don Juan und Faust" (1828); and of works by Comelle, Chadwell, Zamora, Goldoni, Gluck, Dumas, Zorilla, etc.

Donovan (don'ō-van), Edward. Died at London, Feb. 1, 1837. An English naturalist concerning whose personal history little is known except that he was for years possessed of a considerable fortune, which enabled him to travel and make collections of objects in natural history. His chief work is "General Illustrations of Entomology."

Don Pasquale (dōn päs-kwä'le). An opera by Donizetti, first produced at Paris Jan. 4, 1843.

Don Quixote (Sp. pron. dōn ke-hō'te; E. don kwik'sōt). A Spanish romance by Cervantes, printed at Madrid in two parts, the first in 1605, the second in 1615. In 1614, when the second part was nearly completed, an impudent attempt to imitate the character of Cervantes was made by Alonso Fernandez de Avellaneda of Tordesillas (thought to be a pseudonym of Luis de Aliaga), who produced a pretended continuation of the first part. Translations of "Don Quixote" have appeared in every European language, the earliest being the principal English translations are those of Shelton (1612–20), Motteux (1719), Jarvis (1742), Smollett (1755), and Ibdell (1781). (see French Quixote.) The book is named from its hero, Don Quixote de la Mancha, a Spanish country gentleman, who is so imbued with tales of chivalry that he sets forth with his squire Sancho Panza in search of knightly adventure in very unpromising surroundings. In the beginning of the work Cervantes announces it to be his sole purpose to break down the vogue and authority of books of chivalry, and at the end he declares that he had "had no other desire than to render abhorred of men the false and absurd stories contained in books of chivalry," exulting in his success as an achievement of no small moment. See Cervantes.

These two Don Quixote and Sancho Panza sally forth from their native village in search of adventures, of which the excited imagination of the knight, turning windmills into giants, solitary inns into castles, and galley-slaves into oppressed gentlemen, finds abundance, wherever he goes, while the squire translates them all into the plain prose of truth with an admirable simplicity, quite unconscious of its own humor, and rendered the more striking by its contrast with the lofty and courteous dignity and magnificent illusions of the superior personage. There could, of course, be but one consistent termination to adventures like these. The knight and his squire suffer a series of ridiculous discomfitures, and are at last brought home, like madmen, to their native village, where Cervantes leaves them, with an intimation that the story of their adventures is by no means ended.

Tickner, Span. Lit., II. 141.

Dred Scott Case. In American history, a celebrated decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, which derived its importance from its bearing on the constitutionality of the Missouri Compromise of 1820. Dred Scott, a Missouri slave who had been taken to the territory covered by the Missouri Compromise, and had therefore sued for his freedom, was sold to a citizen of another State. He then transferred his suit from the State to the Federal courts, under the power given to the latter to try suits between citizens of different States; and the case came by appeal to the Supreme Court. The decision of the Supreme Court, which was published in 1857, put Scott out of court on the ground that a slave, or the descendant of a slave, could not be a citizen of the United States or have any standing in Federal courts. The opinion of the chief justice also attacked the validity of the Missouri Compromise, on the ground that one of the constitutional functions of Congress was the protection of property; that slaves were recognized by the Constitution as property; and that Congress was therefore bound to protect slavery in the territories.

Drusus (drō'sus), Caesar. Born about 10 B. C.: died 23 A. D. Son of Tiberius and Vipsania. He quelled a mutiny of the legions in Pannonia in 14; was consul in 15; was appointed governor of Illyricum in 16; was consul in 21, and in 22 was invested with the tribunicia potestas, whereby he was declared heir apparent to the throne. He was poisoned by the favorite Sejanus, who aspired to the succession.

Drusus, Marcus Livius. Died probably 109 B. C. A Roman politician. He as tribune of the plebs conjointly with Caius Gracchus in 123, his election having been procured by the senate, whose members were alarmed at the eloquence and incorruptible character of the latter, and at the same time he opposed his veto to the bills brought forward by his colleague, and introduced instead bills of similar import, but making more extravagant concessions, which were passed by the people. He was consul in 112, and while governor of Macedonia, which he obtained as his province, defeated the Thracian Scordisci.

Drusus, Marcus Livius. Died at Rome, 91 B. C. A Roman politician, son of Marcus Livius Drusus. He became in 91 tribune of the plebs, whose favor he won by largesses of corn and by the introduction of a bill providing for a new division of the public lands. This bill, together with another which aimed to fill the senate the places on the juries, of which it had been deprived by C. Gracchus, was passed by the comitia, but declared null and void by the senate. He was assassinated as he was about to bring forward a proposition for the full citizenship on the Italians. His death gave the signal for the outbreak of the Social War.

Drusus, Nero Claudius. Born 38 B. C.: died in Germany, 9 B. C. A Roman general, brother of Tiberius. He was a son of Livia by Tiberius Claudius Nero, and was born shortly after the marriage of his mother with the emperor Augustus. He was adopted, together with his brother Tiberius, by the emperor; and at an early age married Antonia, the daughter of Marcus Antonius. He subdued a revolt in Gaul in 13, and, starting in 12 from the left bank of the Rhine, undertook four campaigns in Germany alone. In the course of which he led the Roman armies to the Weser and the Elbe. He died on the way back, in consequence of a fall from his horse.

Dryden (drī'den), John. Born at the vicarage of Aldwinkle All Saints, Northamptonshire, England, Aug. 9 (?), 1631: died at London, May 1, 1700. A celebrated English poet and dramatic artist. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1650. In 1663 he married Lady Elizabeth Howard, the sister of his friend Sir Robert Howard. Originally a Puritan/an, he went over to the Royalist side, and was poet laureate and historiographer royal 1670–88. In 1679 he had a quarrel with Rochester, which caused him to be cudgeled in the street by masked bravos. The unsettled state of public affairs after the Popish Plot, which induced him to write his series of satires (of which "Absalom and Achitophel" was the first), brought down upon him a storm of libels. He was converted to Roman Catholicism in 1686, but his sincerity has been impugned. His critical writings were numerous and on various subjects. He wrote many prologues, epilogues, and dedications, and after his conversion to Roman Catholicism employed his pen in defense of his faith. His chief poems are "Heroic Stanzas" on the death of Cromwell (1659), "Astræa Redux," celebrating the Restoration (1660), "Annus Mirabilis" (1667), "Absalom and Achitophel" (1681: the second part with Tate, 1682), "The Medal" (1682), "Mac-Flecknoe" (1682), "Religio Laici" (1682), "The Hind and the Panther" (1687), "Translation of Virgil" (1697), "Alexander's Feast" (1697); also translations of Juvenal, Ovid, etc. His last plays are "The Indian Emperor," "Almanzor and Almahide, or the Conquest of Granada," "Aureng-zebe," "All for Love," "Secret Love, or The Maiden Queen," "Sir Martin Mar-all," "Don Sebastian," "An Evening's Love, or The Mock Astrologer," "Marriage à la Mode," "The Kind Keeper," "Amboyna," "The Spanish Friar," "Tyrannic Love," and others. His life is in Johnson's "Lives of the Poets." His works were edited by Scott in 18 volumes (1808).

Duchess, The. The pseudonym of Mrs. Margaret Argles Hungerford.

Duchess of Devonshire. 1. A portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds, at Althorp Park, England. The figure is shown in full length, wearing a plumed turban, and about to descend a flight of steps.

2. A noted portrait by Gainsborough, stolen from the gallery of the New British Institution, London, in 1876. The duchess is represented in full length, standing in a garden walk, and wearing a broad-brimmed plumed hat.

Duchess of Malfi, The. A tragedy by Webster, played about 1612, printed in 1623. There is a dramatic version of the story among Lope de Vega's works, and it forms the subject of one of Bandello's "Novelle." In Webster's more popular play, the one offensive feature is the character of the duchess herself. Her high and noble spirit, whose power of mind and healthiness of purpose have kept her uncontaminated by the loveless coterie about her, is admirable. She dares to act for herself, though a woman; she does not forget she is a woman, and sees nothing ignoble in the faithful love of a subject.

Bosola. . . . I'll describe her
She's a good woman long out of, and she seems Rather to welcome the end of misery,
Than shun it; a behaviour so noble,
As gives a dead man eloquence with mourners.
You may discern the shape of loveliness
More perfect in her tears than in her smiles:
She will muse for hours together; and her silence,
Methinks, expresseth more than if she spoke.

Webster, Duchess of Malfi.

Durandana (dö-rän-dä'nä). The sword of Roland (Orlando). It is also called Durendal, Durendie, Durandarte, etc.

He (Roland) had fought all day in the thickest of the fray, dealing death-blows with his good sword Durendal, but all his prowess could not save the day. So, wounded to death, and surrounded by the bodies of his friends, he stretched himself on the ground, and prepared to yield up his soul. But first he drew his faithful sword, than which he would sooner have spared the arm that wielded it, and saying, "O sword of unparalleled brightness, excellent dimensions, admirable temper, and hilt of the whitest ivory, decorated with a splendid cross of gold, topped by a beryl-line apple, and bearing the sacred name of God, endued with keenness and every other virtue, who now shall wield the invincible, who shall call thee master? He that possessed thee was never conquered, never daunted by the base phantasms of cowardice, but, aided by the Almighty, with thee did he destroy the Saxons, exalt the faith of Christ, and win consummate glory. Happy sword, keeper of such deeds, never was one like thee! he that made thee made not thy fellow." Not unengaged with life from thy side." And lest Durendal should fall into the hands of the infidels, Roland smote it upon a block of stone and brake it in twain. Then he blew his horn, which was so resonant that all other horns were split by the blast. But he blew it with all his might, till the veins of his neck burst. And the blast of that dread horn,

On Fontarabian echoes borne, reached even to King Charles's ears as he lay encamped and ignorant of the disaster that had befallen the rear-guard eight miles away. Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 56.

Durandarte (dö-rän-där'te). A legendary Spanish hero whose exploits are related in old Spanish ballads and in "Don Quixote," II. 23. He was the cousin of Montesinos, and was killed at the battle of Roncesvalles. Dürer (dü'rer), Albrecht. Born at Nuremberg, Bavaria, May 21, 1471: died there, April 6, 1528. A famous German painter and engraver, the founder of the German school. He was the son of a goldsmith who first instructed him in his trade and then apprenticed him to the painter Michael Wolgemuth for three years and a half, after which (1490) he visited Strasburg, Colmar, Basel, and Venice, where he was much impressed by the works of Mantegna. He returned in 1494 and married Agnes Frey. He probably worked in the studio of Wolgemuth until 1498, when he removed to an atelier of his own. From 1505 to 1507 he lived in Venice. Then followed his most active years in Nuremberg. From 1517 he worked for the emperor Maximilian, who made him his court painter, and whom he attended at Augsburg in 1518 as deputy for his native city to the assembled Diet. In 1520–21 he visited the Netherlands. He attended the coronation of Charles V. at Aix-la-Chapelle, and obtained the appointment of court painter before his return to Nuremberg, where he continued to work until his death. He may be regarded as the founder of etching. He was designer of woodcuts and an engraver he ranks higher than as a painter. His woodcuts number nearly 200, including "The Apocalypse" (15 subjects), "The Greater Passion" (12 subjects), and "The Lesser Passion" (37 subjects). His copperplates number over 100, including "Melancholia," "Death and the Devil," "The Little Passion" (16 subjects), "St. Jerome in his Study," etc. Among his paintings are "Adoration of the Trinity" (Vienna), "Adam and Eve" (Florence), "Four Apostles" (Nuremberg), etc. He wrote "Von Menschlicher Proportion" (1528), and works on "Measurement" (1525) and "Fortification" (1527). Durer never employed fresco, although he furnished the designs for the mural decorations of the city hall at Nuremberg, the "Calumny of Apelles" and the "Triumph of Maximilian."

Durham (dur'am). [ME. Duresm, Duresmic, altered from Dunholm, AS. Dunholm (ML. reflex Dunholmum, Dunelmum, Dunelmus), hill-isle, from dun, hill (down), and holm, island: applied orig. to the rocky peninsula on which the first church was built.] A county in northern England, lying between Northumberland on the north, the North Sea on the east, and Westmoreland and Cumberland on the west. It is separated from Yorkshire by the Tees on the south. It is mountainous in the west, is fertile in the south, partly coal and lead, and is noted for its breed of cattle. It was a county palatine until 1836. Area, 1,042 square miles. Population (1891), 1,016,359.

2. The capital of the county of Durham, situated on the Wear in lat. 54° 46′ N., long. 1° 35′ W. It contains a castle founded in 1072 by William the Conqueror, and rebuilt by Bishop Hugh of Puiset a hundred years later. The latter possesses many features of interest, as the beautiful Norman arcade, floor, and gallery, the Norman chapel beneath the 14th century keep, the refectory of the 14th century, and a 17th-century carved staircase of oak. The castle is now occupied by Durham University. The cathedral of Durham is a monument of great intrinsic importance, which is enhanced by its imposing position on the brink of a steep hill above the river Wear. The west front is flanked by two massive square towers, and a tower of similar form rises high over the crossing. The present church was founded at the end of the 11th century, and was practically completed by the middle of the 12th. The Lady chapel or Galilee is later, and the curious east transept called the Nine Altars, at the eastern extremity of the choir, is of the early 13th. The cloister is Perpendicular. The Norman interior is exceedingly impressive. The piers of the nave are alternately cylindrical and square, with engaged shafts; the former are covered with zigzag and other lines-patterns. The altar-screen and episcopal throne are of the 14th century, the stalls of the 17th. The eastern or Nine Altars transept is architecturally beautiful, and is very skilfully joined to the older work. The Galilee chapel, projecting in front of the western façade, has four interior walls resting on round chevron-molded arches which spring from slender clustered columns, the whole supporting the roof in a manner rather Saracenic than Northern. The dimensions of the cathedral are 510 by 80 feet, length of transepts 170, height of vaulting 70, of central tower 214. The old monastic buildings are still almost complete, and are of high interest. Durham was, perhaps, a Roman station. It became the seat of a bishopric of Lindisfarne in 995, and its bishops were, in the middle ages, nearly independent rulers over the palatinate of Durham. Population (1891), 14,868.

3. A city in Durham County, North Carolina, northwest of Raleigh. It has important tobacco manufactures. Population (1890), 5,485.

Earth (ėrth). [Usually, but without much probability, referred to $\sqrt{}$ ar, plow.] The terraqueous globe which we inhabit. It is one of the planets of the solar system, being the third in order from the sun. The figure of the earth is approximately that of an ellipsoid of revolution or oblate spheroid, the axes of which measure 12,756,906 meters and 12,713,042 meters, or 7,926 statute miles and 1,041 yards and 7,899 statute miles and 1,023 yards, respectively, thus making the compression 1:293. The radius of the earth, considered as a sphere, is 3,963 miles. The mean density of the whole earth is 5.6, or about twice that of the sun, and its interior is probably metallic. The earth revolves upon its axis in one sidereal day, which is 3 minutes and 55.91 seconds shorter than a mean solar day. Its axis remains nearly parallel to itself, but has a large but slow gyration which produces the precession of the equinoxes. The whole earth revolves around the sun in an ellipse in one sidereal year, which is 365 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, and 9 seconds. The ecliptic, or plane of the earth's orbit, is inclined to the equator by 23° 27′ 28″.68 mean obliquity for Jan. 0, 1850, according to Hansen. The earth is distant from the sun about 93,000,000 miles.

East India Company. The name of various mercantile associations formed in different countries in the 17th and 18th centuries for the purpose of conducting under the auspices of the government a monopoly of the trade of their respective countries with the East Indies. (a) The Danish East India Company was organized in 1618; was dissolved; was reorganized in 1670; and was finally dissolved in 1729, when its possessions, the chief of which was Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast, were ceded to the government. (b) The Dutch East India company was formed by the consolidation of several smaller companies March 20, 1602. It received from the state a monopoly of the trade on the further side of the Strait of Magellan and of the Cape of Good Hope, including the right to make treaties and alliances in the name of the States-General, to establish factories and forts, and to employ soldiers. It founded Batavia in Java on the site of a native city in 1619, and in the middle of the 17th century held the principal seats of commerce throughout the Indian archipelago, including Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, and Borneo, and had flourishing colonies in South Africa. It was dissolved and its territories transferred to the state Sept. 12, 1795. (c) The English East India Company, composed originally of London merchants, was incorporated by Queen Elizabeth Dec. 31, 1600, under the title of "The Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading with the East Indies." It obtained from the court of Delhi in 1612 the privilege of establishing a factory at Surat, which continued to be the chief British station in India until the organization of Bombay. In 1615 it received permission of Sháh Jehán to build Fort St. George, at Madras. In 1661 it was invested by Charles II. with authority to make peace and war with infidel powers, coin gold and silver money, and exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction in its settlements. In 1698 it obtained a grant of the island of Bombay, which formed part of the dowry of Catharine of Portugal. In 1757 it established a factory on the Hugli in Bengal, which led to the foundation of Calcutta. In 1769 it maintained, by the capital seized at the Rajah of Tanjore's, a second territorial conquests which resulted in the acquisition and organization of British India. A government board of control was established by Parliament in 1784, and in 1858 the company relinquished its political functions to the government of the crown. (d) The French East India Company was founded by Colbert in 1664. It established a factory at Surat in 1668, and acquired Pondicherry, which became the capital of the French possessions on the Coromandel coast. Eblis (eb'lis), or Iblis (ib'lis). In Arabian mythology, the chief of the evil spirits. Beckford introduces him in "Vathek." See Azazel.

> His person was that of a young man whose noble and regular features seemed to have been tarnished by malignant vapours. In his large eyes appeared both pride and despair: his flowing hair entwined some resemblance to that of an angel of light. In his hand, which thunder had vibrated, he swayed the iron sceptre that causes the monster Armahbel, the Afrits, and all the powers of the abyss to tremble. Beckford, Vathek, p. 192.

Eblis, Hall of. See the extract.

> In the midst of this immense hall, a vast multitude was incessantly passing, who severally kept their right hands on their hearts [which were on fire], without once regarding anything around them. They had all the livid paleness of death. Their eyes, deep sunk in their sockets, resembled those phosphoric meteors that glimmer by night in places of interment. Some stalked slowly on, absorbed in profound reflection; some, shrieking, tore their hair, and dashed about, like tigers wounded with poisoned arrows; whilst others, grinding their teeth in rage, roamed along, more frantic than the wildest maniac. Beckford, Vathek, p. 191.

Edda (ed'ȧ). [ON. Edda, poetics. Etymologically connected with ON. oddr, poetry, meter, mind, soul.] A work written in prose and verse) by Snorri Sturlusson, born 1178: died by assassination 1241), containing the old mythology of Scandinavia and the old rules for versemaking; also, a recollection of ancient Icelandic poems. The name Edda (whether given by Snorri himself is not known) occurs in the manuscripts of one of the manuscripts of the work. Snorri's Edda, as it was originally written consisted of three parts: the Gylfaginning (delusion of Gylfi), an epitome of the old mythology; Skaldskaparmal (art of poetry), an explanation of poetical expressions and periphrases; and Hattatal (list of meters), a laudatory poem on the Norwegian king Hakon Hakonsson, and had Skáldatal, in which all names of verse used in the old poetry are enumerated. To these was ultimately added a Formáli (preface), and the Rúnatal-þáttur (enigma of Runes), describing the origin of poetry, and in some manuscripts Hulda, or a mixed glossary of synonyms, lists of poets, etc. The work was intended as a handbook of poets. In the year 1643 the Icelandic bishop Brynjolf Sveinsson discovered a collection of old mythological poems which was erroneously ascribed to Sæmund Sigfusson (born 1056, died 1133), and called the Edda Sæmundar. Edda thus Fredha, the Edda of Sæmund the Learned. The poems that compose this Edda are of unknown origin and authorship. They are supposed to have been collected about the middle of the 13th century, but were composed at widely different periods down from the 9th century. As the Icelandic word Edda is said to be assigned, hence the name now given to this collection, the Elder or Poetic Edda, in distinction from the Younger or Prose Edda of Snorri, to which alone the name Edda legitimately belonged. The Elder Edda is usually considered to include 32 poems (some of them fragmentary) and of which are in Bæmund's MS., the Codex Regius of the Elder Edda, and the rest in other MSS.

Eden (ē'den). [Traditionally derived from Heb. 'eden, delight, pleasure, probably connected with Babylonian edinu, a plain or park.] In biblical history, the name of the first abode of man, in the midst of which a garden, the garden of Eden (the "paradise"), was planted. The position of Eden is described in Gen. ii. 8, by four rivers that go out from it and by the countries they surround or pass through. These rivers are the Euphrates and Tigris (Hebrew Perath and Hiddekel), are the well-known rivers of Mesopotamia; the other two, Pishon and Gihon, have been identified in many quarters. Most of the latest hypotheses, that of Friedrich Delitzsch, assumes that the narrator in Genesis thought Eden located near the city of Babylon, and that the Pishon and Gihon were canals. In absolutely impossible to identify the countries mentioned in this passage with territories in that region. It is generally agreed that the description in Genesis alludes to the Babylonian legend.

He came in 1871 to New York, where he perfected the duplex telegraph (1872), and invented the printing telegraph for gold and stock quotations. After the manufacture of his latter apparatus he established a workshop at Newark, N. J. In 1876 he removed to Menlo Park, N. J., where he has since devoted himself to inventions and to scientific experiments. Among his inventions are his system of duplex telegraphy (which he subsequently developed into quadruplex and sextuplex transmission), the carbon telephone transmitter, the microtasimeter, the phonograph, the megaphone, the phonograph, and the incandescent electric lamp.

Edith (ē'dith). [ME. Edith (ML. Editha), AS. Eadgyth.] Died at Winchester, Dec. 19, 1075. An Anglo-Saxon queen. She was the daughter of Godwine, earl of Wessex, and married Edward the Confessor in 1045, over whom she exercised considerable maternal influence. She is said to have planned the murder of Gospatric, one of the king's thegns, in 1064, at the instigation of her brother Tostig, earl of Northumberland. She founded a church at Wilton, which was consecrated in 1065; and on the death of her husband retired to Winchester, in the quiet possession of which she was allowed to remain by William the Conqueror.

Edmund (ed'mund), or Eadmund, Saint. [AS. Eadmund, L. Edmundus, F. Edmond, It. Edmondo, Sp. Pg. Edmundo.] Born about 840; killed by the Danes 870. King of East Anglia 855–870.

Edmund, Saint. Born at Abingdon, England, Nov. 20, probably between 1170 and 1175; died at Soisy, France, Nov. 16, 1240. Archbishop of Canterbury. He was the son of one Edward or Reinald Rich, studied at Oxford and Paris, and in 1233 was appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He came forward as a champion of the national church against papal encroachments, but finding himself unable to resist the appointment of 300 Italians to as many English benefices, abandoned his archiepiscopal see in 1240 and took refuge in the monastery of Pontigny, in France. He died at Soisy, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health, and was canonized in 1247. He is also called Edmund Rich and Edmund of Pontigny.

Edmund I., or Eadmund, surnamed Magnificus ("the Magnificent"). Born about 922; killed at Pucklechurch, Gloucester, England, May 26, 946. King of the West Saxons and Mercians. He was the son of Edward the Elder, and a brother of Athelstan whom he succeeded in 940. He subdued Cumberland (945), which had been held by Malcolm I. of Scotland. He was killed by a robber named Liofa while keeping the feast of St. Augustine of Canterbury at Pucklechurch, 6 miles southeast of Bristol. The robber having entered the hall unbidden, the king ordered a chamberlain to remove him, and when the robber resisted came to the cup-bearer's relief. In the struggle that ensued he was stabbed to death with a dagger.

Edmund II., or Eadmund, surnamed Ironside. Born probably about 989; died, probably at London, Nov. 30, 1016. King of the West Saxons. He was the son of Ethelred "the Unready," whom he succeeded in April, 1016. After many battles over the Danes, he was defeated in a bloody battle at Assandun (Ashington) in Essex by Canute, with whom he was forced to divide his kingdom, provision being made for the survivor's succession to the sole king. He retained Wessex, Essex, East Anglia, and London, while Canute received Northumberland and Mercia. His death, which was probably due to natural causes, has been attributed by later tradition to poison administered by Eadric Streona at the instance of Canute. After his death Canute took possession of the whole kingdom.

Edmund. In Shakspere's "King Lear," a bastard son of the Earl of Gloster.

Edmunds (ed'mundz), George Franklin. Born at Richmond, Vt., Feb. 1, 1828. An American statesman. He was a Republican senator from Vermont to Congress 1866–91; was a member of the Electoral Commission in 1877; and was acting Vice-President 1883–84. He is the author of the Edmunds Act of 1882 for the suppression of polygamy in Utah, and of an act passed in 1887 pertaining to the same subject.

Edom (ē'dom), or Idumea (id-ū-mē'ā). [Heb., 'reddish,' 'muddy.'] The region in the lowland south of the Dead Sea, bounded on the west by the desert of Paran, and on the northeast by the mountains of Moab; the modern Wadi el Arabah and the surrounding mountainous country, extending southward to the Ælanitic Gulf, and including the seaports Elath and Eziongeber. The most important cities of this rugged border territory were Bozrah, the capital Maon, Phunon, and Sela, afterward called Petra, from which the whole district was named Petræa. The dominant race were the Edomites, the brother of Jacob, and were, therefore, designated as "brothers of Israel" (Num. xx. 14, Deut. ii. 4, 8), but became later the hereditary enemies of Israel. They attacked them (1 Sam. xiv. 47) and subdued them (2 Sam. viii. 13). After the division of the Israelitish kingdom they came under the supremacy of Judah, but made frequent and sometimes successful attempts to regain their independence. They were for the last time subjected by Uzziah about the middle of the 8th century B. C. Tiglath-Pileser III. mentions (about 740) Salma Malik, king of Edom, tributary. Esarhaddon (680–668) mentions Kaus Gabri of Edom among the tributary kings. In the time of Nebuchadnezzar (604–561) Edom, still ruled by a king, was attacked by the Babylonians. During the captivity they took possession of portions of Judea, while their own territory was occupied by Arabian tribes, the Nabathæans, and was called, after the city of Petra, Arabia Petræa. The Hasmonean king John Hyrcanus took Dora and Morissa and forced the Idumeans to accept Judaism about 130 B. C. Afterward they became the rulers of the Jews in the person of Antipater and his descendants the Herodians. The last king of this race, Herod Agrippa II., died about 100 A. D., but the name of Idumea vanishes from history with the fall of Judea.

Edred, or Eadred (ed'red). Died at Frome, England, Nov. 23, 955. A king of England, youngest son of Edward the Elder and Eadgifu, and brother of Edmund I., whom he succeeded in 946. His government was controlled by his mother and Dunstan; his reign was marked by revolts in Northumbria.

Edrei (ed're-i). [Heb., 'strong,' 'mighty.']

Edward (ed'ward), surnamed "The Elder." [AS. Eádweard, guardian of property, L. Edwardus, F. Edouard, It. Edoardo, Eduardo, Odoardo, Sp. Eduardo, Pg. Eduardo, Duarte, O. Edoardo.] Died at Farndon, Northamptonshire, in 924. King of the West Saxons, son of Alfred the Great whom he succeeded in 901. He defeated his cousin Ethelwald, who disputed his title to the throne. On the death of his sister Ethelfleda (Ethelda), the widow of Æthelred, ealdorman of Mercia, he incorporated Mercia (which had long acknowledged the overlordship of the West-Saxon kings) with Wessex. He completed the conquest of the Danelagh, or Five Boroughs of the Danes, conquered East Anglia and Essex, and received the submission of Strathclyde and all the Scots. At his death he ruled Wessex, Kent, and Sussex by inheritance; Mercia, Essex, and East Anglia by conquest; and Northumberland, Wales, Scotland, and Strathclyde as overlord.

Edward, surnamed "The Martyr." Born probably in 963. Murdered March 18, 978. King of the West Saxons, son of Edgar whom he succeeded in 975. He was elected by the witan though the influence of Saint Dunstan, primate of England, despite of the measures taken by his stepmother, Elfrida, to secure the crown for her son, Ethelred. He was anointed by this order, and was succeeded by his stepbrother, Ethelred II.

Edward, surnamed "The Confessor," from his reputed sanctity. Born at Islip, Oxfordshire, about 1004: died Jan. 5, 1066. King of the West Saxons, son of Æthelred II. and Emma of Normandy. He lived chiefly in Normandy during the Danish supremacy. He was elected to the throne of his father through the influence of Godwine, earl of Wessex, on the death of Harthacnut, in 1042. He married Editha, daughter of Godwine, in 1045. He died without issue, and was succeeded by his wife's brother Harold, who settle was disputed by William, duke of Normandy. A establishment of his right was made by Godwine in 1020, of the so-called "Laws of Edward the Confessor." He was canonized in 1161.

Edward I., surnamed "Longshanks." Born at Westminster, England, June 17–18, 1239: died at Burgh-on-the-Sands, near Carlisle, England, July 7, 1307. King of England 1272–1307. He was the son of Henry III. and Eleanor of Provence. In 1254 he married Eleanor of Castile. He took an active part in the struggle between his father and the barons, inflicting a decisive defeat on their leader, Simon de Montfort, at Evesham in 1265. He engaged, 1270–72, in the seventh crusade, and was returning from the Holy Land when he heard of his accession to the throne. He reached England in 1274, in which year he was crowned. In 1276 he began the conquest of Wales, which had become practically independent during the barons' wars, and in 1283 successfully completed it by finally expelling the Danes from England in 1290. On the death of the Maid of Norway, granddaughter of Alexander III. of Scotland, the Scottish estates were unable to decide between the two chief claimants to the throne, Baliol and Bruce, with the result that Edward was appointed arbitrator. He decided in favor of Baliol, whose homage he received. In 1295 he became involved in a war with France, which formed an alliance with Scotland. In 1296 he defeated the Scots at Dunbar, compelled Baliol to resign the crown, carried the Scotch coronation stone to London, and placed Scotland under an English regent, who was, however, defeated by the patriot Sir William Wallace in 1297. Edward defeated the Scots under Wallace in the battle of Falkirk, July 22, 1298. In 1303 he concluded the peace of Amiens with France, having married in 1299 Philip IV.'s sister, Margaret. Invading Scotland in 1303, he received the submission of Bruce, and in the next year the execution of Wallace, who had been betrayed to the English. He died on the way to Scotland, where a new insurrection had placed Bruce on the throne as Robert I. Among the chief noteworthy events of his reign were the publication of the first statute of Winchester in 1275; the separation of the old Kings Court into the Common Pleas court of Exchequer, court of King's Bench, and Court of Common Pleas; the development of the jurisdiction of the Royal Council (later the Star Chamber) and of the chancellor; the publication of the statute of mortmain in 1279, and the statute of Westchester in 1285; and the summons in 1295 of the first perfect Parliament.

Edward II. Born at Carnarvon, Wales, April 25, 1284: murdered at Berkeley Castle, near Gloucester, England, Sept. 21, 1327. King of England 1307–27. He was the fourth son of Edward I. by his first wife, Eleanor of Castile. He was created in 1301 the first Prince of Wales. On his accession to the throne he recalled his friend, Piers Gaveston, who had been banished by Edward I. He married Isabella of France in 1308. The insolence of Gaveston having aroused the anger of the barons, the latter was banished through their influence in 1308, only to be shortly recalled by the king. In 1310, in consequence of the incompetence of Edward, who was completely under the ascendancy of Gaveston, the government was intrusted by the barons to 21 ordainers, who procured the passage of the ordinances of the Parliament of 1311, in accordance with which Gaveston was exiled, and provisions were made for annual Parliaments and for the reform of administrative abuses. In 1312 the barons brought about the execution of Gaveston, who had been recalled by the king. In 1314 Edward was defeated by the Scots under Robert Bruce at the battle of Bannockburn (June 24). The exile of his new favorites, the two Despensers, by Parliament in 1321 involved him in a war with the barons, who were defeated at the battle of Boroughbridge in 1322. In 1325, after an unsuccessful invasion of Scotland, he concluded a peace for thirteen years with Bruce, whose assumption of the royal title was passed over in silence. His queen, Isabella, having in 1325 been sent to France to negotiate with Charles IV. concerning the English fiefs in France, intrigued with Roger Mortimer and other disaffected barons, landed in England in 1326, captured Bristol, executed the Despensers, and imprisoned Edward, who was deposed by Parliament and murdered in Berkeley Castle.

Edward III. Born at Windsor, England, Nov. 13, 1312: died at Sheene (Richmond), England, June 21, 1377. King of England 1327–77. He was the son of Edward II. and Isabella of France. On the deposition of his father, he was proclaimed king under a council of regency, the actual government being exercised by the queen and her favorite, Roger Mortimer. He married Philippa of Hainault in 1328, and in the same year concluded the treaty of Northampton with the Scots in which Robert Bruce was recognized as king. In 1330 he took the government into his own hands, securing the execution of Mortimer and imprisonment of his mother. On the death of Bruce in 1329, Edward Baliol seized the crown, to the exclusion of Bruce's infant son David. Baliol did homage to Edward, and a revolt of the nobles drove him across the border. Edward defeated the national party at Halidon Hill in 1333, and restored Baliol. In 1339 he became involved in a war with France (the Hundred Years' War), in which he claimed in right of his mother. In 1346, at the battle of Neville's Cross, his army defeated the Scots under David II. (Bruce), who had recovered the throne on the departure of the Scots, however, succeeded in maintaining their independence. He gained with his son, the Black Prince, the victory of Crecy over the French in 1346, and reduced Calais in 1347, while the Black Prince gained the victory of Poitiers in 1356. In 1360 he concluded with the French the peace of Bretigny, by which he renounced the French crown and Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, in return for the cession in full sovereignty to England of Aquitaine, Ponthieu, Guisnes, and Calais. He subsequently, in a war with Charles V., lost all his possessions in France, with the exception of Bordeaux, Calais, and Bayonne. During his reign occurred several visitations of the "black death" (1348–49, 1361, and 1369).

Edward IV. Born at Rouen, France, probably April 29, 1441: died April 9, 1483. King of England 1461–83. He was the son of Richard, duke of York, and Cecily Neville, and was born at Rouen or Westmoreland. He was known as the Earl of March previous to his accession, and played a prominent part in the struggle of the house of York with that of the house of Lancaster for the possession of the throne. In conjunction with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick he defeated the Lancastrians under Henry VI. at Northampton in 1460, and took King Henry prisoner. His father, the Duke of York, was defeated and killed at the battle of Wakefield later in the same year, whereupon Edward succeeded to the title. In 1461 Edward himself defeated the Lancastrians at Mortimer's Cross in 1461, and was proclaimed king at London March 3, 1461. The early part of his reign was disturbed by the struggles of the Lancastrians to regain the throne. In 1464 he secretly married Elizabeth Grey, daughter of Richard Woodville, Earl Rivers, and widow of Sir John Grey of Groby. This caused a revolution under the Earl of Warwick, who joined forces with the Lancastrians and proclaimed the deposed and captive Henry VI. king. Edward suppressed the rising by the battle of Hexham (May 14, 1471) and Tewkesbury (May 4, 1471), in the former of which Warwick was slain.

Edward V. Born in Westminster Abbey, Nov. 2 or 3, 1470: murdered in the Tower of London in 1483. King of England April–June, 1483. He was the son of Edward IV. by Elizabeth Woodville. He succeeded to the throne under the regency of his uncle Richard, duke of Gloucester, who secretly put him and his brother to death and usurped the throne himself.

Edward VI. Born at Hampton Court, England, Oct. 12, 1537: died at Greenwich, near London, July 6, 1553. King of England 1547–1553. He was the son of Henry VIII. by his third queen, Jane Seymour, and succeeded to the throne under the regency of his uncle, the Duke of Somerset. His reign was established about 1550 by the Duke of Northumberland. During his reign occurred the publication of the 42 articles of religion and the introduction of the Book of Common Prayer. He was succeeded by the Duke of Northumberland to assign the crown to Lady Jane Grey, to the exclusion of Mary and Elizabeth.

Edward, Prince of Wales, called the Black Prince. Born at Woodstock, England, June 15, 1330: died at Westminster, England, June 8, 1376. Son of Edward III. He fought with distinction at Crecy in 1346, gained the victory of Poitiers in 1356; was created duke of Aquitaine in 1363, defeated the Castilians at Navarete in 1367, and subdued Limoges in 1369.

Edward I. A play by Peele, printed in 1593.

This work occupies a very noteworthy position in the progress of English tragedy, for it marks the transition from the chronicle-histories, of which it may be taken as example in Bale's "Kynge Johan," where elements of the morality are still present, to the Histories of Shakspere. Boyd, Hist. Dram. Lit.

Edward II. A tragedy by Marlowe, entered on the Stationers' Register July 6, 1593. It was probably written about 1590, but was not published till 1598, after Marlowe's death. Charles Lamb remarks that "the reluctant pangs of abdicating royalty in Edward furnished hints which Shakspere since improved in his Richard III."

Edward III. A tragedy attributed to Marlowe, founded on Holinshed's "Chronicle," acted in 1590. It was entered on the Stationers' Register in 1595; was printed anonymously in 1596; and at one time was attributed to Shakspere.

Egypt (ē'jipt). [Heb. Mizraim, Assyr. Muçur, Ar. Miçr, Coptic Kemé, Gr. Αἴγυπτος, L. Ægyptus, F. Égypte, G. Ägypten, It. Egitto.] 1. A country in northeastern Africa, now a dependency of Turkey, famous for the great antiquity and former splendor of its civilization. It is bounded by the Mediterranean on the north, and extends southward, including the delta and the valley of the Nile, to the first cataract (lat. 24° N.). On the east it is bounded by the Gulf of Suez, the canal, the Arabian Desert, and by the desert. It includes also the Sinaitic peninsula and a strip on the western coast of Arabia. The present southern limit of its possessions is the latitude of Wadi Halfa of the second cataract. Egypt proper consists practically of the delta and a narrow strip on each side of the Nile. The soil has been enriched for its fertile existence, due to the inundations of the river, and it was long the granary of Rome. Modern Egypt has 14 mudiriyehs or provinces, with Cairo as the capital and Alexandria as the seaport. The government is a hereditary viceroyalty, ruled by a khedive, subordinate to Turkey. The inhabitants are Egyptians (fellaheen, town-people, and Bedawin), Nubians, Abyssinians, Berbers, Turks, Syrians, Greeks, Armenians, and Europeans. The leading religion is Mohammedan, but there are many Copts. The prevailing language is Arabic. The history of ancient Egypt is usually known under 31 dynasties. (see Manetho.) These dynasties are thus grouped by Mariette: the Ancient Empire, dynasties I.–X.; the Middle Empire, dynasties XI.–XVII.; the New Empire, dynasties XVIII.–XXI. The 1st dynasty was founded by Menes in 5004 B. C., according to Mariette. During the earlier dynasties Memphis was the center, and in the time of the 4th occurred the building of the Pyramids (about 4000 B. C. Mariette). The construction of Lake Moeris and the Labyrinth are assigned to the 12th dynasty. Thebes was the capital in the middle empire, and after the invasion of the Hykses occurred (in the 16th dynasty). After a period of confusion and obscurity Egypt was united under the great Theban line. Thebes was the capital, and the 19th reached its highest point in extent and in the grandeur of its monuments. Among the great sovereigns were Rameses III., Seti I., and Rameses II. The "Pharaoh of the Exodus" has frequently been identified with Menephtah of the 19th dynasty, and the date stated approximately at about 1300 B. C. The 21st dynasty began the decline. There were some revivals of power, and in the 7th and 9th centuries Greek settlements began; but in 527 B. C. Egypt was conquered by Cambyses, and this Persian dynasty ranks as the 27th. Its 4 native rulers again held power, but in 340 B. C. a short-lived Persian dynasty (the 31st and last of Manetho) began; this was overthrown in 332 B. C. by Alexander the Great. At his death Egypt was ruled by his general Ptolemy and Ptolemy's successors down to the death of Cleopatra (30 B. C.), when Augustus annexed it to the Roman empire. Egypt was an important center of Christianity. In about 640 it was conquered by the Saracens, and formed in later times part of the dominions of Mohammedan rulers. The Fatimites ruled it from 969 to 1171, and thereafter the Ayubites until 1250; to these succeeded the Mamelukes who in turn were overthrown in 1517 by Turkey. Under the latter Egypt was invaded by Bonaparte in 1798, but the French were expelled in 1801. In 1806 Mehemet Ali became pasha, and the country developed greatly. A successful war with Turkey was cut short in 1840 by the intervention of the powers. In 1869 the Suez Canal was opened. From 1879 France and England exercised a joint supervision over the Khedive; but a native revolt began under Arabi Bey in 1881, and suppressed by England in 1882, was followed in 1883 by the abolition of the joint control, and the appointment of an English financial adviser. The rebellion in the Sudan revolted in 1881–85, and in spite of the resistance of Gordon at Khartum and the campaigns of Wolseley and others the provinces south of Assuan and Wadi Halfa were lost. Area, 94,698 square miles. Population, 6,817,265.

Egyptus was in old times the name of the Nile, which was so called by Homer (Odys. iv. 477; xiv. 257); and Strabo (xvii. p. 691) says the same was the opinion of Nearchus. Manetho pretends that the country received the name from Egyptus, a surname of King Sethos (or Sethi). Aristotle thinks that "Egypt was formerly called Thebes, and Herodotus states, in opposition to the opinion of the "Ionians," that "Thebes (i. e. the Thebaid) had of old the name of Egypt." And if this is not confirmed by the monuments, the word "Egypt" is at least of all events connected with Coptos, a city of the Thebaid. From Kebt, Koft, or Coptos, the modern inhabitants have been called Copts: its ancient name in hieroglyphics was Kebt-hor; and Mr. Poole is evidently right in supposing this to be the same as the Biblical Caphtor. He thinks the name "Egypt" is composed of Aia, "land," and Ventos; and is to be traced in the Al-Caphtor, "land (or coast) of Caphtor," in Jeremiah (xlvii. 4). The word Coptitie is found in a Gnostic papyrus, supposed to be of the second century (see note on ch. 83). Egypt is said to have been called originally Aetia, and the Nile Aetos and Siris. Upper Egypt, or the Thebaid, has even been confounded with, and called, Ethiopia: perhaps for by Pliny (vi. 35; see notes on ch. 110); Nahum (iii. 9) calls Ethiopia and Egypt the strength of No (Thebes); and Strabo says (i. p. 57) that Menelaus' journey to Ethiopia really meant to Thebes. The modern name Musr or Misr is the same as the Biblical Mizraim, i.e. "the two Misrs," applied to Egypt, which corresponds to "the two regions" of the sculptures; but the word Misr does not occur on the monuments.

Rawlinson, Herod., II. 23

2. A diocese of the prefecture of the East, in the later organization of the Roman Empire.

Egyptian Expedition, The. An expedition undertaken by the French against Egypt in 1798–1801, with the ultimate object of attacking the British empire in India. It was commanded by Napoleon Bonaparte; sailed from Toulon with 35,000 men May 19, 1798; conquered Malta June 12, 1798; defeated the Mamelukes in the battle of the Pyramids July 21, 1798; captured Cairo July 22, 1798; suffered the loss of its fleet by the victory of Nelson at Abukir Aug. 1, 1798; and in 1799 invaded Syria, but was in the same year repulsed by the Turks and the British at Acre, and returned by sea to Cairo. In Aug., 1799, Bonaparte returned to France, leaving in command Kleber, who was murdered in 1800, and was succeeded by Menou. Menou concluded a treaty with the English at Cairo in 1801, in accordance with which Egypt was restored to the Ottoman Porte, and the French army transported to France by the English fleet.

She was the mother of Launcelot's son Sir Galahad. (c) The "lily maid of Astolat" who pined and died for Launcelot. Tennyson makes her story the subject of his "Elaine." (d) The daughter of King Brandegoris, who bore a child to Sir Boris de Ganis. In Malory's "Arthur" the statement is so worded that Elaine might be the name of the child. (e) The wife of Ban of Benoic (Brittany), mother of Sir Lancelot. She was also called Elein.

Elam (ē'lam). [In the Assyro-Babylonian inscriptions, Elamtu, highland; OPers., Uvaǰsha (from which the modern Chuzistan arose), with the Greeks Kοσσαι (Herodotus), Susiana (during the Macedonian period), and Elymais (Strabo).] The country and ancient empire east of the lower Tigris, south of Media, and north of the Persian Gulf. It is a country of fertile and picturesque mountains, valleys, and plains, bounded on the land side by the shores of the Persian Gulf; and was in very high antiquity the seat of a mighty empire of which Susa was the capital. The oldest historical information about Elam is that it subjugated Babylonia about 2300-2276 B. C. The Elamite dynasty is identified with the Median of Berosus, which ruled over Babylonia about 2300-1976 B. C. Among these Elamite kings is also very probably to be counted Chedorlaomer (Kudur-Lagamaru) of Gen. xiv. The next historical notice is that Elam was subdued by Nebuchadnezzar I., king of Babylonia, about 1120 B. C. In the 9th century B. C. on, Elam was connected with the rivalry between Assyria and Babylonia, supporting the latter against the former. Elam was defeated by Sargon in 721 and 710, and by Sennacherib in several campaigns, especially in the decisive battle at Halule on the Tigris about 691. In 645 Assurbanipal destroyed Susa. Soon after this catastrophe Elam is not met with under the dominion of Theispes. In union with Media and Persia it helped to bring about the fall of Assyria and Babylonia. It shared thenceforth the fate of the other Asiatic provinces and kingdoms subject to the Persian monarchy. The ancient Elamites were not Semites. This is ascertained by the nature of their kings, which are alien to all of the Semitic dialects, and by their representations on the monuments, which exhibit a type widely different from the Semitic. The enumeration of Elam among the sons of Shem in Gen. x. 22 may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that the Elamite dynasty was early modified by Semites, who predominated over the non-Semitic element of the population, and also by the fact that the Elamites on the other hand had for more than two centuries the upper hand in Semitic Babylonia.

El-Araish (el-ä-rā-ēsh'), or El-Arish (el-ä-rēsh'), or Larache. A seaport in Morocco, situated on the Atlantic in lat. 35° 13′ N., long. 6° 9′ W. Population, about 5,000.

El Dorado (el dō-rä'dō). [Sp., 'the gilded.'] The reputed king or chief of a fabulous city of great wealth (Manoa) which, during the 15th century, was supposed to exist somewhere in the northern part of South America. According to the tale, the chief periodically smeared with oil or balsam, and then covered with gold-dust until his whole body had a gilded appearance. Beginning about 1530, great numbers of expeditions were made by the Spaniards in search of this phantom: the explorers suffered terrible hardships, and hundreds died. The conquest and settlement of New Granada resulted from the quest; the names of the seas of Venezuela, the Orinoco and Amazon, and the great forests east of the Andes, were made known to the world; and later in the 16th century Sir Walter Raleigh, penetrated into Guiana, obtaining a claim on that country which resulted in their modern colony. It has been supposed that the story of El Dorado arose from a yearly ceremony of an Indian tribe near Bogotá. The chief, it is said, was smeared with balsam and gold-dust, after which he threw gold, emeralds, etc., into a sacred lake and then bathed there. But this ceremony was never witnessed by the Spaniards, and the story may be simply another version of the Dorado myth. In common and poetical language the name El Dorado has been transferred to the city or country which was the object of the quest.

Eleusis (el-ū'sis). [Gr. Ἐλευσίς.] A deme of Attica, Greece, the seat of a very ancient cult of Demeter, and of the famous Eleusinian mysteries. The most important monuments lay within the sacred inclosure, which consisted of a spacious terrace on the eastern slope of the Acropolis, surrounded by a massive wall. The precinct was entered by two propylæa or monumental gateways in succession, and its chief building was the temple of the mysteries, whose unique architecture and successive transformations, as well as those of the entire precinct, have been revealed by the excavations of the Archæological Society of Athens, prosecuted at intervals since 1882. The propylæa were two monumental gateways to the sacred inclosure. The lesser propylæa constituted a comparatively simple structure, with three doorways separated by antæ, before which stood ornate columns. The greater were a reproduction, by Appius Claudius Pulcher in 48 B. C., of the famous propylæa of the Athenian Acropolis. The temple (sekos) of the mysteries of Demeter and Kora was rebuilt in the 5th century B. C. and altered later. It measured within 158 by 170 feet, and was surrounded along the walls by 8 tiers of step-seats for spectators of the ceremonies. In every side except the northeast there were two doors. Along the southeast side was carried the great Doric portico of Philon, of 12 by 2 columns.

Elgin Marbles. A collection of Greek sculptures comprising the bulk of the surviving plastic ornaments of the Parthenon, and a caryatid and column from the Erechtheum, and recognized as containing the finest existing productions of sculpture. The marbles were brought from Athens between 1801 and 1805 by the Earl of Elgin. The Parthenon sculptures were executed under the direction of Phidias, about 440 B. C. The collection includes remains of the pediment statues in the round, a great part of the frieze, in low relief, about 3½ feet long, which surrounds the cella, and the caryatid and column of the eastern frieze carved in very high relief with episodes of the contest between the Centaurs and the Lapithæ. Among the figures of the pediment figures are the grand reclining figure of Hesseus, his with wind-blown drapery, and the group of one reclining and two seated female figures popularly called the "Three Fates." The cella frieze represents the idealized Panathenaic procession to the Acropolis, made up of youthful cavalrymen, chariots, sacrificial victims, young girls with utensils, magistrates, and spectators, who set out from the southwest angle of the cella and proceed by both long sides to the east front, where in presence of an assembled company of the gods the chief priest prepares to perform the solemn rites. The skill with which the exceedingly low relief of this frieze is carried out is unparalleled in art.

Elijah (e-lī'ja). [Heb., 'Yahveh is my God'; in the New Testament Elias, Gr. Ἠλίας.] A Hebrew prophet of the 9th century B. C. An account of him is given in 1 Kt. xvii., xviii. 2 Kt. i. xi., and 2 Chron. xxi. 12–15. He appears to have taught at Gilgal, Carmel, and Horeb, and to have called Elisha to the prophetic office. He was by tradition fed by ravens at Cherith, and by the widow of Zarephath, whose dead son he restored to life. In the extremity of the famine he appeals before Ahab, but on whom he is called from the heaven he consumes a sacrifice to Jehovah, with the result that the king orders the extermination of the prophets of Baal, who are made to fall down fire to consume those of strangers by the sword. Later he denounces Ahab and Jezebel for having despoiled and murdered Naboth, and is miraculously carried to heaven in a chariot of fire.

Elijah. An oratorio by Mendelssohn, with words from the Old Testament. He was assisted by Shubring in selecting the words, and by Bartholomew with the English words. It was first performed at Birmingham, Aug. 26, 1846.

In 1808, having attained the grade of colonel, he was sent to the Rio de la Plata, and given command of the forces operating against the English. In April 1810 he was recalled to Spain but refused at the end of the year to recognize Buenos Ayres, appointed by the Spanish junta of the regency. The junta of Buenos Ayres refused to recognize his commission, war followed, and Elío was besieged in Montevideo, but eventually arranged a treaty with the revolutionists by which both parties recognized the authority of Ferdinand VII. and the unity of the Spanish nation, and agreed to refer their differences to the Spanish Cortes (Oct. 20, 1811). Elío was recalled to Spain two months after, and in 1812 and 1813 commanded against the French in Catalonia and Valencia, winning a series of brilliant victories. In 1814 he was made governor and captain-general in Valencia and Murcia. The revolution of 1820 caused his deposition and imprisonment. Some of his friends made an armed attempt to liberate him; the plot failed, and Elío, accused of instigating it, was found guilty by a court-martial.

Eltekeh (el'te-kē). In ancient geography, one of the cities on the border of Dan: the modern Beit Likia. Near here Sennacherib defeated an Egyptian army which was coming to the relief of Ekron.

When the Jewish embassy arrived at Lachish, the Egyptian party seems still to have been in the ascendant. In spite of the prophet's warning, envoys had been sent to Egypt (Isa. xxx. xxxi.), and had returned full of confidence in an alliance, which yet was to be to them not a help, nor profit, but a shame and also a reproach. The battle of Eltekeh dissipated these hopes. This was fought after the capture of Lachish, when Sennacherib was encamping to take the neighbouring fortress of Libnah (2 Kings xix. 8, 9).

In other respects he was not illiberal, and he was extravagant in speculations and gaming.

Ely (ē'li). [ME. Ely, Elv, AS. Elig, eel island, from ēl, ēl, eel, and ig, island.] A city in Cambridgeshire, England, 15 miles north-northeast of Cambridge. It contains a famous cathedral, a building of great size, begun in 1083. The nave and west tower were completed too early in the end of the 12th century, and the west porch or galilee dates from about 1215. The Norman choir was replaced by the existing presbytery in the middle of the 13th century, and the octagonal central lantern was finished in 1328. The Lady chapel adjoining the north transept, with elaborate vaulting and ornate arcading under the large windows, was built in the middle of the 14th century. The exterior of the church is distinguished by its high, castellated west tower. Under the tower is a curious galilee or entrance porch, which opens into an unaisled west transept. The nave is imposing, and has long ranges of Norman arches and its lofty triforium-gallery. Its roof is of wood. The vaulting of the octagon forms the only existing lantern-dome of the type. The presbytery is among the most excellent achievements of Decorated work. The cathedral measures 530 by 77 feet; length of transept, 178; height of nave, 62; of choir-vaulting, 76. Elysium (ē-liz'ium). The abode of the souls of the good and of heroes after death in the Greek ancient classical mythology. It is described, particularly by later poets, as a place of exceeding bliss. Some have thought it to be in the center of the earth, some in the Islands of the Blest, and some in the sun or moon. In the Odyssey it is plain at the end of the earth "where life is easiest to man. No snow is there, nor yet great storm nor any rain." It is often called the Elysian Fields.

Elze (elt'se), Friedrich Karl. Born at Dessau, Anhalt, Germany, May 22, 1821; died at Halle, Jan. 21, 1889. A German literary critic, professor of the English language and literature at Halle from 1875. He published critical editions of "Hamlet" (1857, 1882), of Chapman's "Alphonsus, and of Webster's "White Devil, or Vittoria Corombona," etc., "Essays on Shakespere," "William Shakspere" (1876; English translation 1888), "Notes on Elizabethan Dramatists" (1880-84), etc.

Elzevir (el'ze-vir), or Elsevier, or Elzevier (el'ze-vēr). A famous family of Dutch printers, celebrated especially for their editions of classical authors, and of French authors on historical and political subjects (a series known as "Les petites républiques"). The original name was Elsevier or Elzevier; in Latinized form it was Elzevirius, which was finally corrupted into Elzevir. Louis, the founder of the family, was born at Louvain, near Brussels, about 1540, and died at Leyden, Feb. 4, 1617. The first book he printed was "J. Dousi Elzeviriani epithalamium, sive quæstionum de repudiis libri duo" (1583), but the first book he published at his own risk was a Europius by P. Merula (1592). He had seven sons. One of these, Matthieu, established his printing-house at Leyden (1565-70), and published (1583-1619) Gilles (died 1651, Joost (1576-1640-50), and Bonaventure (1583-1652). The last was the most celebrated. In 1626 he took into partnership his nephew Abraham, a son of Matthieu. In 1647 Jean (1622-61), son of Abraham, joined them, and after their death Daniel (1626-80), son of Bonaventure, came into the firm. For many years Daniel continued alone till his death. Daniel went to Amsterdam in 1654, and entered into partnership with Louis (1604-70), the third of that name, who had established a printing-press there in 1638. Isaac, a son of Matthieu, established a press in Leyden which was in existence from 1616 to 1715. The last representative of the name was Abraham, son of Joost, who printed a few volumes at Utrecht between 1695 and 1712, and Abraham, the son of Abraham the first, who was university printer at Leyden 1681-1712.

Many of the Elzevir publications bear a peculiar typographical mark in the simply the words Apud Elzevirios, or Ex officina Elzeviriana, under the rubrique of the town. Isaac took as typographical mark the branch of a tree surrounded by a belt bearing the words Sic vos non vobis, and below it a man standing, with the motto non solus. The third Louis adopted Minerva with an olive branch, and the motto ne cedere nescius. When the Elzevirs did not wish to put their name to their works they generally marked them with a sphere, but of course the mere fact that a work appeared in the 17th century was proof that it no proof that it is theirs. The total number of works of all kinds which bear the name of the Elzevirs is 1,248, of which 965 are in Latin, 41 in Greek, 126 in French, 21 in Flemish, 22 in the Eastern languages, 11 in German, and 10 in Italian. *Encyc. In 1876 he joined Gordon Pasha, then governor of the Sudan, explored the Albert Nyanza Lake, and visited Mtesa in 1877. In 1878 he was made bey and governor of the Equatorial Provinces. In a few years he raised his ruined provinces to relative prosperity, made rich scientific collections and completed the accounts of Schweinfurth and Junker. From 1887 he was cut off by the Mahdi from communication with England and his position soon became precarious. Stanley went to his relief, and both reached the east coast in 1889. In the service of Germany he returned to Central Africa in 1890, accompanied by Captain Stuhlmann and Lieutenant Langheld. He established the station of Bukoba, and left it in charge of Lieutenant Langheld. With Dr. Stuhlmann he then proceeded to Mpwapwa, Ukonongo, etc., to make his way to the west coast by way of the Sham. At Mamiri west of Albert Nyanza, the rebellion of his carriers compelled him to return to Bukoba. Here Stuhlmann rejoined him in the autumn with the richest harvest of scientific data ever gathered by an African expedition. After several false reports of his death it is now believed left that he was killed by the Arabs in an engagement near Nyangwe, and his body eaten by the cannibal Manyema, in the fall of 1892.

Empedocles (em-ped'o-klēz). [Gr. Empedokles.] Local Agrigentine, Sicily: lived about 490-430 B. C. A Greek philosopher, poet, and statesman. He was a supporter of the democratic party in his native city against the aristocracy, and possessed great influence through his wealth, eloquence and knowledge. He refused the sovereignty, which was his by leadership. He professed magic powers, prophecy, and a miraculous power of healing, and came to be regarded as both a superhuman character. He is said to have thrown himself into the crater of Etna in order that, from his sudden disappearance, the people might believe him to be raised.

The fame of Empedocles of Agrigentum, who seems across the mists of ages and traditions to stand distinct from him, presents perhaps a more romantic appearance than that of any other Greek philosopher. This is owing, in a great measure, to the various and splendid fictions connected with myself, to his reputed avowal of magical power, and to the wild sublimity of some of his poetic utterances. Yet, even in his lifetime, and among contemporary Greeks, he was put through the ordeal of a legal charge at law, and left to posterity the famed gowns as a poet, a physician, a priest, and a philosopher.

Eoïæ (ē-oi'ē). [Gr. ai Hoiai; so called because each section began with ἠοίη, 'such was she.'] See the extract. The work was attributed to Hesiod.

This poem, the "Eoiæ" . . . celebrated the heroines of Bœotia and Thessaly from whose union with gods had sprung heroes; and formed a fourth book to the "Catalogue of Women," an epic history of Dorian and Æolian women, famous indeed, but not of that half-divine rank which belonged to the "heroines." These names of poems show how the Hesiodic school was connected with Dorian Locris, where the position of women was peculiarly high.

Eperjes (ā-per-yesh'), Hung. Eperjes (ā-per-yesh'). The capital of the county of Sáros, Hungary, situated on the Tarcza in lat. 48° 59′ N., long. 21° 17′ E. It was founded by a Germandolony, and was the scene of the execution of Protestants by the Imperialist Caraffa in 1687. Population (1890), 10,341.

Epernay (ā-per-nā'). A town in the department of Marne, France, situated on the Marne 19 miles northwest of Châlons-sur-Marne. It is the chief center of the trade in champagne, the wine being stored here in vaults in the chalk rock. Population (1891), commune, 18,501.

Ephesiaca. See Babyloniaca and Æthiopica.

Ephesus (ef'e-sus). [Gr. Ἔφεσος.] In ancient geography, one of the twelve Ionian cities of Asia Minor, in Lydia, situated on the Cayster, near its mouth, in lat. 37° 57′ N., long. 27° 21′ E. It was conquered by Cyrus the Persian. Alexander the Great, and the Romans. It was celebrated for its temple of Artemis, and as a great commercial city, but was important in the middle ages. It was a favored residence of Paul, and the seat of the third general council in 431, and of the Robber Synod in 449. On its site are Ayasoluk and other small villages. Among its ruins are the second theater mentioned in Acts xix. 29. It is Greek in plan, with Roman modifications. The cavea, 495 feet in diameter, has two praecinctiones, with 11 ranges in the lower ranges and 22 in the highest, which is skirted by a colonnaded gallery. The orchestra is 110 feet in diamcter, and the prosceniun 22 feet wide. (b) The odeum, ascribed to the 2d century A. D., in plan it is a half-circle 162 feet in diameter. There was one proscenium, with 5 cunei below and 10 above it, and a rich corinthian gallery around the top. The orchestra is 30 feet in diameter; the stage has 3 doors and 6 corinthian columns. (c) A stadium ascribed to the time of Augustus. It is 840 feet long and about 230 wide. The north side and semicircular east end are supported on vaulted substructions, the south side on the rock of the hillside. A double colonnade was carried along its entire length, and ornamental arches at the upper gallery of the eastern end were also of stairways. (d) A temple of Artemis (pictured in the Ephesian) a famous sanctuary founded in the 6th century B. C., and rebuilt in the 4th. The temple was ionic, dipteral, octastyle, with 21 columns on the flanks, and measured 163 by 342 feet. The height of the columns was 60 feet, their diameter at the base 6 feet 4 inches. The frieze and metopes were richly sculptured with figures in relief. Fine examples in the British Museum. The cella had interior ranges of columns, forming the two aisles mentioned above.

Ephesus, Council of. 1. The third ecumenical council, called by Theodosius II, in connection with Valentinian III., held at Ephesus under the direction of Cyril of Alexandria in 431 A. D. Eighty-eight bishops responded to the call, and included for the first time papal delegates from Rome, who were instructed not to say in the debates, but to sit as judges over the proposals discussed. It condemned the heresy of Nestorius without scruple, largely through the influence of Cyril. 2. The so-called Robber Council, convoked by Theodosius, held at Ephesus under the presidency of Dioscurus of Alexandria in 449. It included 130 bishops. It reinstated Eutyches in the office of priest and archimandrite, from which he had been expelled by the synod of Constantinople (448), and deposed Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, who was so roughly handled that he died three days after the assembly.

Ephialtes (ef-i-al'tēz). [Gr. Ἐφιάλτης.] In classical mythology, a blind giant who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right by Hercules.

Ephialtes, died 456 B. C. An Athenian statesman and general, associated with the friend and patron of Pericles, and was the principal author of law which abridged the power of the Areopagus and changed the government of Athens into a pure democracy. He was, according to Aristotle, assassinated by Aristodicus of Tanagra, at the instance of the oligarchs.

Ephorus (ef'o-rus). [Gr. Ἔφορος.] Born at Cumæ; lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. A Greek writer, author of a universal history, fragments of which have been preserved.

Ephraem (ē'fra-em) Syrus ('the Syrian'). Born probably at Nisibis, Mesopotamia, about 308 A. D.; died at Edessa, Mesopotamia, about 373. A theologian and sacred poet of the Syrian Church. The chief edition of his works was published at Rome 1732–43.

Ephraim (ē'fra-im). [Heb., 'double fruitfulness.'] 1. In Old Testament history, the younger son of Joseph, and founder of the tribe of Ephraim.—2. One of the twelve tribes of Israel: so called from its founder, Ephraim, the son of Joseph. It occupied a central position in Palestine, being bounded on the east by the Jordan, on the west by the Mediterranean, and on the north by Dan, on the south by the tribes of Benjamin, and on the north by that of Manasseh. After the death of Saul the tribe of Ephraim, together with all the other tribes except Judah, recognized Ishbaal (Ishbosheth) as legitimate king in opposition to David; but on the murder of Ishbaal submitted in common with the other tribes to the hegemony of Judah under David. In the death of Solomon it revolted (probably about 975 B. C.) under Jeroboam from Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and formed with the remaining nine of the tribes except Judah, Simeon, part of Benjamin and the Levites, a separate kingdom, which retained the name of Israel, and adopted Shechem as its capital. This kingdom was destroyed by the Assyrians in 722 B. C.

Epic Cycle, The. See the extracts.

> There was a mass of songs and legends about Troy which the two great epics left untouched. This material was worked up between 776 B. C. and 600 B. C. by a number of epic poets of the Ionian school, who made it all linking their poems with the Iliad and Odyssey as introductions or continuations. In later times, compilers of mythology used these links, distinctive poems from the others, and put them in the chronological order of the events, so as to make one connected story. Such a process of compilation was called an epic cycle (or circle), and the complete Troias themselves were called cyclic writers. In modern times the name 'cyclic' has been transferred from the poor compilers to the poets.
> Jebb, Homer, p. 57.

It was once commonly believed that the remaining epic poets equally avoided touching upon one another, that they composed their own poems upon a fixed chronological plan, each resuming where the other had finished, and so completing an immense whole called the epic cycle, from the birth of Aphrodite in the "cypria" down to the conclusion of the "Nostoi, or Telegonia, of Lamamon. But it seems clearly made out now that no such fixed system of poems existed, that the authors, widely separated in date and birthplace, were no corporation with fixed traditions; that they did not overlap in subject, and repeat the same legends; and that the epic cycle does not mean a cycle of poems, but a cycle of legends, arranged by the grammarians as illustrated them by a selection of poems, or parts of poems, including, of course, the Iliad and Odyssey, and then such other epics as told the whole story of the Theban and Trojan wars, down to the conclusion of the heroic age.

Epicharmus (ep-i-kär'mus). [Gr. Ἐπίχαρμος.] Born in the island of Cos about 540 B. C.; died at Syracuse at an advanced age (ninety or ninety-seven). A Greek comic poet. At an early age he was carried to Megara, in Sicily, and thence, when Megara was sacked by Gelon, to Syracuse. Thirty-five titles of his comedies are extant, and he is said to have written 52 plays.

The notice that he [Epicharmus] added letters to the alphabet arises either from some later letters being first adopted in his works, or from his intimacy with simonides at Syracuse. It is not impossible, as Simonides did adopt some additions, that he personally helped Epicharmus to spread their use in copies of his very popular plays.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 402.

Epicœne (ep'i-sēn), or The Silent Woman. [Gr. Σιγωσα, of either gender, pronounced.] A comedy by Ben Jonson, produced in 1609. Epicœne was a supposed silent woman who really spoke softly and in monosyllables. She was brought to Morose, who had an insane horror of noise, by his nephew who wished to play him a trick. After the wedding Epicœne scolds, screams, and develops into a virago; but after many noisy, rough tricks and jokes which drive Morose to the verge of distraction, he is relieved by the arrival of Dauphine, who, in consideration of the payment of his debts and the promise of a proper allowance, reveals the trick, which is that Epicœne is really a boy in disguise—consequently there never was a "silent woman." Colman the elder wrote a version of this play. It was produced at Drury Lane in 1776.

Epictetus (ep-ik-tē'tus) of Hierapolis. [Gr. Ἐπίκτητος.] A celebrated Stoic philosopher. He was a native of Hierapolis in Phrygia, was a freedman of Epaphroditus (the freedman and favorite of Nero), was a pupil of Musonius Rufus, and taught philosophy at Rome until 94 A. D., when he removed to Nicopolis in Epirus, in consequence of an edict of Domitian banishing the philosophers from Rome. Although he left no written works, his essential doctrines are preserved in a manual compiled by his pupil Arrian. He taught that the sum of wisdom is to distinguish between what is and is not in our power, and to bear and forbear; that all unavoidable evil in the world is only apparent and external; and that our happiness depends upon our own will, which even Zeus cannot break.

Epicurus, Sir. See Sir Epicurus.

Epicurus (ep-i-kū'rus). [Gr. Ἐπίκουρος.] Born in Samos, 342 B. C.; died at Athens, 270 B. C. The founder of the Epicurean school of philosophy. He was the son of Neocles, an Athenian cleruch settled in Samos, and belonged to the Attic deme of Gargettus (whence his frequent appellation of the Gargettian). He is said to have studied under Xenocrates at Athens, and subsequently taught at Mytilene and Lampsacus. In 306 he opened a philosophical school at Athens, where he spent the remainder of his life. He is said to have written about 300 volumes, fragments only of which are extant. His will, Diogenes Laertius's list of 40 propositions containing the substance of his ethical philosophy, and letters preserved by Diogenes Laertius. He taught that pleasure is the only possible end of rational action, and that the ultimate principle of bodies is atoms. He adopted the atomic theory of Democritus, while bringing into it the doctrine of chance.

Epidamnus (ep-i-dam'nus). An ancient name for Dyrrachium. See Durrazzo.

Epidaurus (ep-i-dā'rus). [Gr. Ἐπίδαυρος.] 1. A maritime town of Illyricum. It was destroyed some time after the reign of Justinian, and was replaced by Ragusa. It was a Roman colony.—2. A town on the east coast of Peloponnesus, in the district called Argolis under the Romans. Throughout the flourishing period of Grecian history it was an independent state, possessing a small territory (Ἐπιδαυρία) bounded on the west by the Argeia, on the north and east by the Saronic, on the south by the Tree Zenia, and on the east by the saronic Gulf. (Smith.) It was the most celebrated seat of the ancient cult of Æsculapius. The sanctuary occupied the valley among the hills, at some distance from the city. An inner inclosure contained a temple to Æsculapius, the architecturally important theolos of Polycletus, statues, and buildings which served as hospitals to the sick who came to seek the aid of the god and his priests, and many votive offerings. Outside of this inclosure were the stadium, one of the most important of ancient theaters, a gymnasium, propylæa, and other buildings, the arrangements for the collection and distribution of water being especially noteworthy. Almost all our knowledge of Epidaurus is derived from the extensive excavations conducted by the Archæological Society of Athens since 1881, which are still (1890) incomplete.

Epidaurus Limera (li-me'ri). [Gr. Ἐπίδαυρος Λιμηρά.] In ancient geography, a town on the eastern coast of Laconia, Greece, 22 miles north-northwest of Cape Malea.

Epigoni (e-pig'o-ni). [Gr. ἐπίγονοι, descendants.] In Greek mythology, the seven sons of the seven Argive chiefs who had unsuccessfully attacked Thebes. The Epigoni, ten years after the first attempt, defeated the Thebans and avenged their fathers. This was supposed to have occurred shortly before the Trojan war.

Epigoni. A Greek epic poem of the Theban cycle, by Antimachus of Claros, relating to the renewal of the mythical war between Argos and Thebes by the "descendants" of its heroes.

Epimenides (ep-i-men'i-dēz). [Gr. Ἐπιμενίδης.] Lived in the 7th century B. C. A Cretan poet and prophet.

Epimetheus (ep-i-mē'thūs). [Gr. Ἐπιμηθεύς, afterthought.] In Greek mythology, the brother of Prometheus and husband of Pandora. Although warned by his brother, he accepted Pandora as a gift from Zeus, with the result that through her curiosity she liberated evils peculiar to man, which Prometheus had concealed in a vessel.

Épinac (ā-pē-nāk'). A town in the department of Saône-et-Loire, France, 11 miles east-northeast of Autun. It is the center of a coal-mining region. Population (1891), commune, 4,061.

Épinal (ā-pē-nāl'). The capital of the department of Vosges, France, situated on the Moselle in lat. 48° 10′ N., long. 6° 26′ E. It has some manufactures, and contains the departmental museum and a library. It was occupied by the Germans Oct. 12, 1870. Population (1891), commune, 23,223.

Épinal Glossary. An Anglo-Saxon and Old-Saxon glossary preserved at Épinal, France. It was originally from the Abbey of Moyen Moutier, near Lemoncourt. "The type of its writing is of the time of the Caldees; its letters being of First-English, as written by the Celtic priests who labored for the conversion of the English. It is ascribed by Mr. Sweet to the end of the seventh century." (Morley.) Mr. Sweet has edited a facsimile of this glossary, published at London in 1883.

Épinay (ā-pē-nā'), Madame de la Live d' (Louise Florence Pétronille Tardieu d'Esclavelles). Born at Valenciennes, March 11, 1726; died April 17, 1783. French author, an intimate friend of Grimm and Jean Jacques Rousseau. For the latter she erected a cottage, the Hermitage, in the garden of her château, La Chevrette, near Montmorency. Her "Mémoires et correspondance" was published in 1818, and her collected works in 1869.

Epiphanius (ep-i-fā'ni-us), Saint. Born near Eleutheropolis, Palestine, about 315 A. D.; died at sea near Cyprus, 403. A father of the Eastern Church. He became in 367 bishop of Constantia (the ancient Salamis) in Cyprus. He took a prominent part in the theological controversies of his time, and was present at the synods of Antioch (376) and Rome (382), where questions pertaining to the Trinity were debated. He died on the return from a mission to Constantinople after he had gone to oppose the heresy of Origen. He wrote a treatise against heresies entitled "Panarion," a dogmatical work entitled "Ancoratus," etc.

Epipsychidion (ep-i-psi-kid'i-on). ['A little poem on the soul'; from Gr. ἐπί, upon, ψυχή, soul, and dim. -ιδιον.] A poem by Shelley, published in 1821.

Epirus, or Epeiros (ē-pī'rus). [Gr. Ἤπειρος.] In ancient geography, that part of northern Greece which lies between Illyria on the north, Macedonia and Thessaly on the east, Ætolia, Acarnania, and the Ambracian Gulf on the south, and the Ionian Sea on the west (to the Acroceraunian promontory). In earlier times the name was given to the entire western coast southward to the Corinthian Gulf. The kingdom of Epirus reached its height under Pyrrhus (295–272 B. C.). It was ravaged by Æmilius Paulus in 167 B. C.; was a part of the Roman Empire 146 B. C.–395 A. D.; was overrun by Albanians in the 14th century; was conquered by the Turks in the 15th century; and now forms part of the Turkish vilayet Janina, and part of the territory ceded to Greece in 1881.

Episcopius (e-pis'ko-pius) [Lat.; Gr. ἐπίσκοπος, from Bisschop or Bischop), Simon. Born at Amsterdam, Jan. 1, 1583; died at Amsterdam, April 4, 1643. A Dutch theologian, one of the leaders of Arminianism. He published "Confessio" (1621), "Apologia" (1629), "Institutiones Theologicæ," etc.

Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum. [L., 'Letters of Obscure Men.'] A collection of forty-one anonymous letters, first published in 1515, satirizing the ignorance, hypocrisy, and licentiousness of the Roman Catholic monastics at the time of the Reformation. It was occasioned by the controversy between Reuchlin and Pfefferkorn, a converted Jew, who advocated the destruction, as heretical, of the whole Jewish literature, except the Bible, and who was supported by the Dominicans of Cologne. The authorship of the letters is attributed by some to Ulrich von Hutten, Crotus, and Buschius Epithalamium (ep-i-thā-lā'mi-um). A poem by Spenser, published in 1595: a marriage song for his own bride.

> For splendour of imagery, for harmony of verse, for delicate taste and real passion, the "Epithalamium" excels all other poems of its class.

Eponym Canon (ep'o-nim kan'on). The name given by Assyriologists to the list of archons or chief magistrates in Assyria. This office of archon, called in Assyrian limmu, passed in rotation every year to different high dignitaries. Each king was limmu in the second year of his reign, and he was followed by the general of the army, or turtanu. Documents were dated with these names (as in Rome with the names of the consuls of each year). The lists of the limmus were carefully and accurately kept. The custom probably goes back to a remote date, but the four lists of limmus found which are known by the name of Eponym Canon cover the years 911-666 B.C. As each king was limmu in the second year of his reign, the Eponym Canon became of the greatest importance for the chronology of the Assyrian kings. Further and still more interesting information has been derived from these tables, which contain alongside of the name of the limmu a short notice of the principal events of his year. Thus, for instance, during the reign of Asurdan III. (772-754) an eclipse of the sun in Nineveh is recorded, and according to the calculations of the astronomers this eclipse took place on the 15th of June, 763, so that this notice is of prime importance for early chronology.

Epping (ep'ing). A town in the county of Essex, England, 16 miles northeast of London. Population (1891), 2,565.

Epping Forest. A royal forest in southwestern Essex, England, formerly called Waltham Forest. Its area formerly was about 60,000 acres: it now contains 5,600 acres, preserved by London, and opened to the public as a pleasure-ground in 1882.

Éprémenil. See Esprémesnil.

Epsom (ep'sŏm). [Supposed to be equivalent to Ebbe's home: so named from Saint Ebba, queen of Sussex, about A.D. 600.] A market-town in the county of Surrey, 15 miles southwest of London. In 1618 the mineral spring from which Epsom salts were first made was discovered, and in the latter part of the 17th century Epsom became a fashionable resort, and continued so until the middle of the century next to Bath and Cheltenham. It was especially affected by Charles II. Races were run on the downs a mile and a half south of the town in the reign of John Wesley.

Era of Good Feeling. In United States history, a name given to the period from 1817 to about 1824, which was marked by internal harmony and the absence of strong party feeling.

Érard (ā-rär'), Sébastien. Born at Strasburg, April 5, 1752: died at Passy, near Paris, Aug. 5, 1831. A French manufacturer of pianofortes, harps, and organs. He invented the double-action harp in 1808, and made improvements in pianos and organs.

Erasistratus (er-a-sis'tra-tus). Born probably in the island of Ceos: lived about 300 B.C. A Greek physician and anatomist.

Erasmus (e-raz'mus), Desiderius (originally Gerhard Gerhards ('Gerhard's son'). [L. Geert Gerhard. [Gr. ἐράσμιος, beloved, desired: the L. desiderius has the same sense.] Born at Rotterdam, probably Oct. 28, 1465: died at Basel, Switzerland, July 12, 1536. A famous Dutch classical and theological scholar and satirist. He was the illegitimate son of Gerhard de Praet, was left an orphan at the age of nineteen, and was defrauded of his inheritance by his guardians, who compelled him to enter the monastery of Stein. He entered in 1491 the service of the Bishop of Cambray, under whose patronage he was enabled to study at the University of Paris. He subsequently visited the chief European countries, including England (1498-99 and 1509-14), and in 1521 settled at Basel, where he removed to Freiburg in Breisgau in 1529. Refusing all offers of ecclesiastical preferment, he devoted himself wholly to study and literary composition. He aimed to reform without dismembering the Roman Catholic Church, and at first favored, but subsequently opposed, the Reformation, and engaged in a controversy with Luther. His chief performance was an edition of the New Testament in Greek with a Latin translation, published in 1516. Besides this edition of the New Testament his most notable publications are "Colloquies" and "Encomium Moriæ," a collective edition of his works was published by Le Clerc 1703-06.

Éraste (ā-rāst'). 1. The exasperated lover in Molière's comedy "Les fâcheux" ('The Bores'). He has an appointment with Orphise whom he loves, and every person in the play comes in and prevents it.

2. The lover of Julie in Molière's "M. de Pourceaugnac."—3. The lover of Lucille in Molière's comedy "Le dépit amoureux," usually called "Lovers' Quarrels" in English.

Erastians (e-ras'tianz). Those who maintain the doctrines held by or attributed to Thomas Erastus, a Swiss polemic (1524-83), author of a work on excommunication, in which he proposed to restrict the jurisdiction of the church. Erastianism, or the doctrine of state supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, is often, but erroneously, attributed to him.

Erastus (e-ras'tus). Thomas (Grecized from Lieber or Liebler). [Gr. ἐραστός, lovely, beloved.] Born at Auggen, near Badenweiler, Germany, 1524: died at Basel, Switzerland, 1583. A physician and Protestant controversialist. His chief work, a collection of theses on excommunication, was published in 1589.

In 1554 he took service with the commander Alderete who had been appointed governor of Chile. He then made numerous life in South America until 1562, when he returned to Spain. In 1569 he published the first part of "La Araucana" (finished later by the second and third parts), the finest heroic poem in the Spanish language (chiefly as to its historical value).

Erckmann-Chatrian (erk'män-shā-trē-on'). The signature of the literary collaborators Émile Erckmann (born at Phalsbourg, Lorraine, May 20, 1822) and Louis Gratien Charles Alexandre Chatrian (born at Soldatenthal, Meurthe, Dec. 18, 1826; died at Rainey, Seine, Sept. 3, 1890). In 1848 these two men became associated in literary labors, the former writing chiefly and the latter soliciting and publishing. Among their first joint publications are "Science et genie" and "Schinderhannes" (1850), and many short stories. The series of novels to which Erckmann-Chatrian owe a large part of their reputation began with "Le Conscrit de 1813," "Madame Thérèse, ou les volontaires de 1792" (1863), "Histoire d'un conscrit de 1813" and "L'Ami Fritz" (1864), "Waterloo" and "Histoire d'un paysan, ou peuple" (1865), "La guerre" and "La maison forestière" (1866), and many others. Their dramatic compositions and adaptations are "Georges ou le chasseur des ruines" (1858), "L'Alsacien" (1874-1878), "Le Juif polonais" (1869), "L'Ami Fritz" (1876), "Madame Thérèse" (1882), "Les Rantzau" (1884), etc. Erckmann claims the sole authorship of the novels "Les Ingoulin des Vosges" and "Le Fou Yégof" (1877), Chatrian of "Le Brigadier Frédéric" (1880), "Le Blocus" (1881), "Le Banni" (1882), "Les Deux Frères" (1883), "Le Fiancé de la Mère Tantaine" (1884), "Le Grand Maître" (1885), "Le Bleuet" (1886), "Le Bureau de Consultation" (1887), "Le Cavalier Rodolphe" (1888), "Le Docteur Mathéus" (1889), and "Le Fou de Berkem" (1890). Since Chatrian's death Erckmann has contributed to "Le Temps" two publications, "Kaleb et Khoua" and "La première campagne du grand-père Jacques," the latter being the first in a series of stories dealing with the wars of the empire.

Ercles (er'klēz). A corruption of Hercules.

But . . . Yet my chief humour is for a tyrant: I could play Ercles rarely, or a part to tear a cat to make all split . . . This is Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein: a lover is more condoling. Shak., Midsummer Night's Dream.

Ercles' Hercules was one of the roarers of the old rude drama. Thus Greene, in his "Groatsworth of Wit," 1592: "The twelve labours of Hercules have I terribly thundered on the stage." Hudson, Note to M. N. D.

Ercta (erk'tä), or Ercte (-tē). [Gr. Ἔρκτη, Ἔρκτη.] In ancient geography, a mountain in northwestern Africa, about 4 miles south of Palermo: the modern Monte Pellegrino. It was a stronghold of Hamilcar Barca in the last part of the first Punic war.

Erebus. An active volcano in Victoria Land, Antarctic regions, about lat. 78° S., long. 168° E. Height, about 12,367 feet.

Erec (ē'rek) and Enid (ē'nid). See the extract and Enid.

One of the most beautiful of these metrical tales is "Erec and Enide," by Chrestien de Troyes. Erec vanquishes a knight who had insulted an attendant of Queen Geneura at a national hunt. After the battle, Erec discovered on the domains of the person he had conquered his beautiful niece, called Enide, who resided near her uncle's castle, but had been allowed by him to remain in the utmost poverty. Erec marries this lady, and soon forgets all the duties of chivalry in her embraces; his vassals complain, bitterly of his sloth, and Enide rouses him to exertion. Attended by her lord, she sets out in quest of adventures, a number are related.

Erech (ē'rek). One of the four cities of the kingdom of Nimrod, in Shinar or Babylonia: the Greek Orchoë. It was identical with Uruk of the inscriptions, and is now represented by the mound of ruins of Warka, situated on the left bank of the Euphrates southeast of Babylon. It was one of the oldest seats of Babylonian civilization, and had a college of learned priests and a large library. It was also the chief seat of the worship of Ishtar as the presiding deity of Nana. According to an inscription of Assurbanipal (668-626 B.C.) Erech was, in 2280 B.C., invaded by the Elamite king Kudurnankundi, who carried off the image of Nana to Elam, where it remained for 1635 years, till Assurbanipal, in 645, at the conquest of Susa, returned it to its ancient seat. Around the ruins of Erech are found many bricks, so that it would seem that it served as a kind of necropolis.

Erechtheum (ere-ktha'um). An Ionic temple in Athens dating from the end of the 5th century B.C., remarkable for its complex plan and architectural variety, as well as for its technical perfection. It included a shrine to Athena Polias (goddess of the city), and to Erechtheus (Poseidon), the tomb of Erechtheus (whence its name), the salt-spring evoked by Poseidon, and several other peculiarly sacred memorials. The shrine of Athena itself thereof not had the form of a peristyle, but stood on the north side at a lower level than its portico, and had two delicately sculptured columns, with a connecting ornamental doorway to each. It also contained the ancient wooden statue of Athena. The west wall of this hall was raised to a high level on all sides which, except from the eastern portico, had other doors in the middle of each wall. The wall is usually restored as having windows in the intercolumniations. At the west end of the south side is the famous Porch of Caryatides, which had sculptured seats on the heads of six female figures (one in front, making as the most of architectural sculpture. On the west side of the temple was the tomb of Cecrops with the three mysterious olive-tree of Athena, and on which lived the priestesses and the high-born maidens who were selected every year to serve the goddess.

Erechtheus (ē-rek'thūs), or Erichthonius (e-rik-thō'ni-us). In Greek legend, a son of Hephæstus, and an autochthonous hero of Athens: often confounded with another of the same name, sometimes represented as his grandson.

Eregli (e-reg'li), or Erekli (e-rek'li). A town in the vilayet of Kastamuni, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Black Sea in lat. 41° 17′ N., long. 31° 25′ E.: the ancient Heraclea. It is the center of a coal-mining region. Population, about 4,000.

Eretria (e-rē'tri-a). [Gr. Ἐρέτρια.] In ancient geography, a city on the island of Eubœa, Greece, 29 miles north of Athens. It was a rival of Chalcis, was destroyed by the Persians in 490 B.C., and was afterward rebuilt. An ancient theater has been excavated on its site by the French School of Athens. The cavea is supported on an artificial embankment. It was divided by vomit stairways into 11 cunei, and is 266 feet in diameter. The orchestra and the lowest tier of seats a highly important feature here first recognized in an underground passage leading from its center to the interior of the stage-structure. This explains several obscurities in the classical drama.

Erfurt (er'fūrt). A city in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Gera in lat. 50° 58′ N., long. 11° 1′ E. It is famous for its horticulture, and has varied manufactures. It contains a noted cathedral, a church of St. Severus, and a celebrated library which has a cell once occupied by Luther. The town was founded very early, and was a member of the Hanse League. It was subject to the archbishops of Mainz, and the seat of the government of Mainz, and passed finally to the latter. It was acquired by Prussia in 1802, was taken by the French in 1806, and again ceded to Prussia in 1814, and was garrisoned from the 14th century to 1816. In 1808 it was the scene of a conference between Napoleon, Alexander I., and German princes, and in 1850 was the seat of the German Unionparliament. Population (1890) 72,300.

Eric (ē'rik). See Erik (ā'rik), Saint.

Eric (ē'rik). Died near Upsala, Sweden, May 18, 1160. King of Sweden, elected to the throne of Upper Sweden in 1150. He undertook in 1157 a crusade against the heathen Finns, part of whom he conquered and baptized. Soon after his return to Upsala he was attacked by the Danish prince Magnus Hendrikson, and fell in battle.

Eric XIV., King of Sweden. Born Dec. 13, 1533: poisoned Feb. 26, 1577. Son of Gustavus Vasa whom he succeeded in 1560. He attacked the nobles, Katrina Mansdotter, to the throne, after having made unsuccessful overtures of marriage to Queen Elizabeth of England and Mary Queen of Scots. His violence and misgovernment led to his overthrow in 1568 by a conspiracy of the nobles headed by his brothers John and Charles. He was, according to custom in part to death in prison by poison.

Eric the Red. The founder of the first Norse settlement in Greenland. According to the Icelandic sagas, he killed a man in Norway and fled to Iceland, whence he was sent into temporary banishment for a similar outrage, whereupon, in 982, he set sail toward the west in quest of a strange land sighted in 876 by the Norse sea-rover Gunnbiorn. He discovered the country which he named Greenland, and lived there three years, when he returned to Iceland for colonists and supplies for a permanent settlement, which he founded apparently in 986.

Ericht (er'icht). Loch. A lake in Scotland, situated on and near the border of Perthshire and Inverness shire. It is the outlet to Loch Rannoch and the Tay. Length, nearly 15 miles.

Erichthonius. See Erechtheus.

Ericson (er'ik-son), Leif. A Norse adventurer, son of Eric the Red. According to the Icelandic sagas, he sailed from Greenland with 35 companions about 1000 A. D., in quest of a strange land to the west which had been sighted in 986 by the Norseman Bjarni Herjulfsson. He discovered the country which he named Vinland from the grape-vines he found growing in it, and spent a winter there. The coast on which he landed has been variously identified — by some as that of Labrador or Newfoundland, and by others as that of New England.

Ertang (er'tang). See the extract and Mani.

> But Manee went a step further. He avowed himself to be the Paraclete or Comforter foretold by the Saviour, and composed a gospel which he called the Ertang, which was illustrated by pictures drawn by his own hand: he claimed that the Ertang should take precedence of the New Testament. It was this false move that really led to the violent opposition which the Christian church displayed towards the persecuted Manee.

Esar-haddon (ē-sär'had'on). Also, Asser-ahaddon, Asar has given a brother.] King of Assyria 680–668 B. C., the son and successor of Sennacherib. The reign of this king marks the highest glory and power of the Assyrian empire. He first had to quell the disturbance caused by the assassination of his father at the hands of his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Ki. xix. 37; Isa. xxxvii. 38). Then he restored the city of Babylon, which had been destroyed by his father. His expedition extended from Media to Cilicia, and from the frontier of Elam to Arabia, and reached even to Egypt. Among the kings subject to him he enumerates, in his inscriptions, Baal of Tyre, Manasseh of Judah, Kausgabri of Edom, Muzuri of Moab, etc. Three years before this he destroyed Sidon. His most significant conquest was that of Egypt. After several campaigns he defeated Tirhakah (Biblical Tirhakah), the third of the 25th or Ethiopian dynasty, in the battle of Memphis (671), and practically converted Egypt and Ethiopia into an Assyrian province. He drove the Ethiopians out of Egypt, divided the country into districts, and placed over them submissive though mostly native rulers, chief among whom was Necho, who was put over Sais and Memphis. He added then to his many titles that of "King of Kings of Lower and Upper Egypt and Ethiopia." Like all the Sargonides, Esarhaddon was a great builder. Among the fortresses of Babylon may be mentioned his great palace in Nineveh, for the construction of which 22 subject kings had to provide the material, and which, as the excavations by Layard and Rassam show, was celebrated for its halls, which were adorned with winged lions and bulls and sphinxes. In 668 Esarhaddon abdicated in favor of his son Assur-bani-pal.

[From Algonkin eskimatsit, eaters of raw flesh.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians whose habitat extends coastwise from eastern Greenland to western Alaska and to the extremity of the Aleutian Islands, a distance of over 5,000 miles. The winter population is estimated at 25,000 along the coast. The interior is also visited by hunting reindeer and other animals, though the natives rarely penetrate inland farther than 20 miles, a strip of coast 50 miles wide presenting the favorite conditions for Eskimo occupancy. The stock comprises the Greenland, Labrador, middle Alaskan, Aleutian and Asiatic groups, of the principal villages of which Greenland Eskimo, 17 are on the eastern coast, where settlements have extended to lat. 74° 30′. On the west coast villages extend to Smith Sound in lat. 78° 35′, while in Greenland proper the Eskimo habitations have been found in lat. 81° 44′. The Labrador group has 4 prominent villages and a number of less prominent settlements, the southernmost Hamilton Inlet (lat. 55° 30′) formerly the only village situated in Belle Isle Strait (lat. 50° 50′). The middle Eskimo inhabit 20 permanent villages, their ranges extending from the southern extremity of Ellesmere Land, Jones Sound, nearly to James Bay, in Hudson Bay, and westward to Alaska, except the coast between the mouth of Coppermine River and Cape Bathurst, at which point the territory of the Mackenzie Eskimo, about the Mackenzie delta, to Point Barrow. These stretches were used only as hunting-grounds. There are 2 permanent settlements of the Alaskan group. The range of this group extends from Point Barrow westward and southward over almost the entire coast as far as Bristol or Cook Inlet, where the Kolushan domain begins. The Point Barrow Eskimo do not penetrate far inland, but to the south the tribes reach to the head waters of the Noatak and Kowuk rivers, visiting the coast only to trade. The Aleutian group, commonly called Unungan or Aleut, formerly occupied the entire Aleutian Archipelago but since the advent of the Russians and the introduction of the fur trade, their territory has greatly diminished. Atka and Unalashkan are its principal villages. The stock is represented in northeastern Asia by the Tuski of Chukchi Peninsula, who are comparatively recent arrivals from the American coast. The number of the Eskimo is estimated at 34,000, distributed as follows: Greenland group 10,000; Labrador group 2,000; middle or Iglulik group 10,000; Alaskan group 10,000. The number of the Yuit or Asiatic group is unknown.

He was sent to the guillotine by the Revolutionary tribunal.

Esprit des Lois (es-prē' dā lwä). [F., 'Spirit of the Laws.'] A celebrated philosophical work by Montesquieu, published at Geneva in 1748.

The title may be thought to be not altogether happy, and indeed rather ambiguous, because it does not of itself suggest the extremely wide sense in which the word law is intended to be taken. In effect, if without title, for the book would be "On the Relation of Human Laws and Customs to the Laws of Nature." The author begins much too early with the old distinction of politics into democracy, aristocracy, and monarchy. He discusses the principles of each and their bearings on education, on despotic laws, on social conditions, on military growth, offensive and defensive, on individual liberty, on taxation and finance. Then an abrupt return is made from the effect to the cause of constitutions and of polity. The theory of the influence of physical conditions, and especially of climate, on political and social institutions—a theory which is perhaps no more than any other identified with the book deserves special attention, and a somewhat disproportionate space is given to the question of slavery in this connection. From climate Montesquieu passes to the genius and the tone of mind governing civil polity. He then attacks the subject of manners and customs as distinct from laws, of trade and commerce, of the family, of jurisprudence and religion. The book concludes with an elaborate examination of the feudal system in France. Throughout it the reader is equally impressed by the vast and profound knowledge of the author, and at his extraordinary fertility in generalizations. This fertility is indeed sometimes a snare to him, and leads to rash generalisation.

Essenes (e-sēnz'). [LL. Esseni, from Gr. Ἐσσῆνοι, also Ἐσσαῖοι; ulterior origin uncertain.] A Jewish sect of the 2d century B. C., supposed to have sprung from the Chasidim, the zealous religio-political party that originated during the struggles of the Maccabean period against Hellenistic invasions. The Essenes, however, refrained from all political and public affairs, forming a kind of religious order. Their ideal was to attain the highest sanctity of priestly consecration. To this end they separated themselves from the world and lived in settlements in the desert west of the Dead Sea. Most of them lived there in communism and celibacy. Other peculiarities were despising wealth and luxury, strict observance of the sabbath, and, especially, scrupulous attention to the Levitical laws of cleanliness. Their name is said to be derived from their frequent bathing. Their asceticism evolved a theosophic worship, and miraculous cures and apocalypses were ascribed to them. Their external symbols were the white garment, apron, and shovel. They never gained any hold on Judaism, and their number never exceeded 4,000. Their relation to Christianity, and their influence on it, are much discussed points.

The rocca, the seat of the Este family, built in 1343 and strengthened by the Scaligers, is a built-up ancient medieval fortress with a mighty keep. Population, about 6,000.

Este. One of the oldest and most celebrated of the princely houses of Italy, according to modern genealogists a branch of the house of the Guelphs. It traces its origin to Oberto II., margrave of Susa, who overcame the Lombards in 774, and Oberto I. imperial count palatine in Italy under the emperor Otto I. Oberto's grandson, Azzo II., was invested by the emperor Henry III. with Este and other Italian fiefs, was created duke of Milan, and adopted the name of Este. His two sons Welf IV. and Fulco I. became the founders, respectively, of a German and an Italian branch of the house of Este, the German branch being in modern times represented by the houses of Brunswick and Hanover. The Italian branch furnished the leaders of the party of the Guelphs in Italy in the 13th and 14th centuries, its chief seats being at Ferrara, Modena, and Reggio. Rosso received the title of duke of Modena and Reggio from the emperor Frederick III., and Borso that of Duke of Ferrara from Pope Paul II. The male line of the Italian branch of the house of Este became extinct on the death of Alfonso II. in 1597. His only daughter, Maria Ricarda, married Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, third son of the emperor Francis I., who became the founder of the Austrian branch of the house of Este, the male line of which became extinct in 1875.

Etherege (eth'ėr-ej), Sir George. Born 1636 (?) died 1690 (?). An English dramatist. The facts of his early life are obscure. He wrote "The Comical Revenge" (1664), "She Would if She Could" (1668), and "The Man of the Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter" (1676). He was the inventor of the comedy of intrigue.

Two more atrocious libertines than these two men [Etherege and Sir Charles Sedley, who acted as the bound in the apartments at Whitehall, or in the streets, taverns, and dens of London. Yet both were famed for like external qualities. Etherege was easy and graceful, Sedley so ineffably seductive of manner that Buckingham called it "witchcraft" and Wilmot "his prevailing Gentle art." I, humbler witness, can only say that after studying their work and their lives, that Etherege was a more accomplished comedy writer than Sedley, but that Sedley was a greater lord than Etherege.

Etruria (ē-trō'ri-ä). [L. Etruria, Hetruria, Gr. Ἐτρουρία (the reg. Gr. name being Τυῤῥηνία), the country of the Etrusci, Etruscans. Hence Tuscan, Tuscany.] In ancient geography, a division of Italy which extended along the Mediterranean, and was separated from Umbria, the Sabine territory, and Latium by the Tiber, and from Liguria by the Apennines. It nearly corresponds to modern Tuscany. It contained a confederation of 12 cities: probably Veii, Clusium, Tarquinii, Faleri, Cære, Volsinii, Cortona, Perusia, Arretium, Volci, Vulsinii, and Rusellæ. The Etruscans developed as a great naval power, influential in northern and central Italy, and had possessions on the Po and in Campania. Etruscan kings ruled at an early date in Rome (probably till about 500 B. C.). The Etruscans were defeated by Syracuse in a naval battle in 474 B. C., and suffered from the invasion of the Gauls about 400. Veii was lost to Rome in 396. Later wars with the Vadimonian Lake in 283 was followed by the fall of Tarquinii and the other Etrurian cities.

Etruria. A village in Staffordshire, England, noted as the seat of the Wedgwood potteries.

Etruria, Kingdom of. A kingdom formed by Napoleon from the grand duchy of Tuscany in 1801, and bestowed upon the Crown Prince of Parma. It was annexed to France in 1808.

Etrurians (ē-trō'ri-ąnz), or Etruscans (ē-trus'-kąnz). The ancient inhabitants of Etruria, the modern Tuscany. See Etruria.

The Etrurians are the most mysterious people of antiquity. We meet them in the sculptured chronicles of ancient Egypt as the Tursha, and in the pages of the earliest Greek writers as the Tyrrhenes, or Turseni. According to ancient tradition, they came from Lydia in prehistoric times, and colonized Latium. Certain details of their costumes and customs appear to be identical with those of Lydia, and the legend is probably based upon fact. But until the inscriptions of Etruria can be read, we are not likely to solve this problem. The Etruscan characters closely resemble the archaic alphabets of Asia Minor; and one scholar has gone so far as identifying more than proper names and names of deities.

Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 91.

Lately the discovery of an inscription on the island of Lemnos seems to render probable the identity of the Etruscans with the Pelasgian Tyrrhenians of the Mediterranean. La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 324.

Ettlingen (et'ling-en). A town in Baden, 4½ miles south of Karlsruhe. It has manufactures of paper, etc., and is noted for its Roman antiquities. Here the French under Moreau defeated the Austrians under Archduke Charles, July 9 and 10, 1796. Population (1890), 6,548.

Ettmüller (et'mül-ler), Ernst Moritz Ludwig. Born at Gersdorf, near Löbau, Saxony, Oct. 5, 1802: died near Zurich, Switzerland, April 15, 1877. A German philologist, professor of the German language and literature in the gymnasium at Zurich. He edited Middle High German and Old Low German texts, and published works on Norse, an Anglo-Saxon chrestomathy (1850), an Anglo-Saxon lexicon (1851), etc.

Ettrick (et'rik). A river in Selkirkshire, Scotland, which joins the Tweed near Selkirk. Length, 32 miles. The tract of woodland on and adjoining it was formerly known as the Ettrick Forest.

Etymologicum Magnum (et'i-mō-loj'i-kum mag'num). [ML., tr. Gr. τὸ ἐτυμολογικὸν μέγα, the great dictionary.] See the extract.

The remaining great lexicon of the Byzantine age, the Etymologicum Magnum as it is called, does not puzzle us by assuming the name of any definite author. It may, indeed, be doubted whether there was not more than one compilation bearing this name, and whether it denoted more than a bookseller's or scribe's collection and edition of divers glossaries made up from the works of the most eminent grammarians. The work has already appeared in two different forms, derived from manuscripts of two different classes: the one, which is sometimes called the Etymologicum Sabbaiticum, because the first critical revision was that which Sylburg founded on the original publication of Marcus Musurus; the other, which is termed the Etymologicum Gudianum, because it was derived by Sturz from a manuscript at Wolfenbüttel, belonging originally to Marquard Gude. There is, indeed, reason to suppose that the work published by Musurus got its title of Etymologicum Magnum from the first editor or from its printer Calliergus. The age of the work may, however, with some probability, be assigned to the 10th century or thereabouts. It may be best described as a farrago of extracts from the most esteemed grammarians, copied slavishly and arranged in alphabetical order.

Eucharis (ū'ka-ris). In Fénelon's "Télémaque," one of Calypso's nymphs with whom Télémaque falls in love. Mentor removes him from the island to get him out of her way. She is said to be meant for Mademoiselle de Fontanges, a favorite, for a short time, of Louis XIV.

Euchites (ū'kīts). [LGr. Εὐχῖται, from Gr. εὐχή, prayer.] A sect which arose in the 4th century in the East, particularly in Mesopotamia and Syria. Its members attached supreme importance to prayer and the presence of the Holy Spirit, led an ascetic life, and rejected sacraments and the moral law. The sect continued until the 7th century, and was for a short time revived a few centuries later. Its members are also called Adelphiens, Euthusiasts, Enuthusmo, Messaliens, etc.

Euclid (ū'klid). [Gr. Εὐκλείδης.] Lived at Alexandria about 300 B. C. A famous Greek geometer. His principal work is the "Elements" (Στοιχεῖα), in 13 books, parts of which have been largely used as a text-book for elementary geometry down to the present time. The editions and translations of this work have been very numerous.

Euclid of Megara. Born probably in Megara, in the middle of the 5th century B. C. A Greek philosopher, a disciple of Socrates, and the founder of the Megaric school.

Eudes (ōd), or Odo (ō'do), Count of Paris. Died in 898. King of France 888–898. He defended Paris against the Northmen under Rollo in 885, and, after the death of Charles the Fat, in 888, was elected king of France by the nobles in preference to the legitimate heir, the Simple, the infant son of Charles the Fat. He was, however, compelled to cede to the latter the country between the Seine and the Rhône.

Eudes I. Died in Cilicia, March 23, 1103. Duke of Burgundy. He fought under the standard of Alfonso VI., king of Castile and Leon, against the Saracens in 1087. He afterward departed on a crusade to the Holy Land, and died in Cilicia.

Eudes III. Died at Lyons, July 6, 1218. Duke of Burgundy. He took part in 1209 in the crusade against the Albigensians, and in 1214 commanded the right wing of the French army at the battle of Bouvines.

Eudes IV. Died at Sens in 1350. Duke of Burgundy. He married the daughter of Philip, king of France, in 1318.

Eudes. Born 665; died 735. Duke of Aquitaine and Vasconie (Gascony). His dominions were invaded by the Saracens under Abder-Rahman, who were repulsed with the aid of Charles Martel at Poitiers in 732.

Eudes. Died in 1037. Count of Champagne. He was defeated and killed in an attempt to make himself master of Lorraine.

Eudes de Montreuil (ēd dẹ mōn-trẹ'y'). Died 1289. A French sculptor, architect, and engineer. He went to the Holy Land in 1248, and in 1250-51 constructed the fortifications of Jaffa. In 1254 he returned to Paris. In 1262 he built the Church of the Cordeliers, and that of the Chartreux in 1276. In the Church of the Cordeliers he was accorded sepulture, and erected his own tomb with life-size statues of himself and his two wives. This monument was described in the reign of Henry II. It was destroyed in 1580.

Eudeve. See Ayuta.

Eudocia (ū-dō'shi-ạ). [Gr. Εὐδοκία, esteem, honor.] Born at Athens about 393; died at Jerusalem about 460. A Roman empress. She was the daughter of the sophist Leontius, or, as he is also called, Heraclitus of Athens, who gave her a careful education. She married the emperor Theodosius II. in 421, having previously exchanged her original name Athenais for Eudocia at baptism. Having supplanted the emperor's sister, Pulcheria, in the administration of the government, she effected the convention of the so-called Robber council of Ephesus in favor of which Flavian, the patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed by the Pope. Shortly after this the emperor took up the cause of the orthodox party, in consequence of which, as well as of his jealousy of the wealth bequeathed to him in 449, she took a number of poems, including a paraphrase of the Octateuch.

Eudocia. A Byzantine empress, wife of Constantine XI., and afterward of Romanus IV. At his death in 1067 Constantine bequeathed the empire to her and their three young sons, Michael II., Andronicus I., and Constantine XII. Although bound by oath not to marry again, she espoused Romanus in 1068, and made him a colleague in the empire with herself and her sons, whereupon Leo, the brother of Constantine, proclaimed Michael VII. sole emperor, and banished Eudocia to a convent. She compiled a dictionary of history and mythology, entitled Ἰωνία or "collection (or bed) of Violets," which is still extant.

Eudoxia (ū-dok'si-ạ). [LGr. Εὐδοξία, good report, honor.] A Byzantine empress, daughter of the Frank Bauto. She married in 396 Arcadius, by whom she became the mother of Theodosius II., or "the Younger." She acquired a complete ascendancy over her husband, and procured the exile of Chrysostom, patriarch of Constantinople, who inveighed against the avarice and luxury of the court.

Eudoxia. Born at Constantinople, 422. A Roman empress, daughter of Theodosius II. She married in 439 or 437 Valentinian III., who was murdered by Petronius Maximus in 455. Compelled to marry the usurper, she called in Genseric, king of the Vandals, who took Rome and carried off Eudoxia and her two daughters, Eudocia and Placidia, to Carthage. Maximus was killed by the Romans, and Eudoxia was restored to Constantinople with an honorable escort.

Eudoxians (ū-dok'si-ạnz). The followers of Eudoxius, patriarch of Constantinople and an extreme Arian of the 4th century: same as Anomœans, Aëtians, and Eunomians.

Eugene (ū-jēn'). Prince (François Eugène de Savoie-Carignan) [Ger. Eugen Franz Reichsgraf; L. Eugenius, Eugenius Franciscus; It. Sp. Pg. Eugenio, G. Eugenius, Eugen.] Born at Paris, Oct. 18, 1663; died at Vienna, April 21, 1736. A celebrated Austrian general. He was the son of Prince Eugène Maurice de Savoie-Carignan, comte de Soissons, by Olympia Mancini, a niece of Cardinal Mazarin. He was intended for the church, and when about ten was created abbé of Carignan. Being refused a commission in the French army by Louis XIV., he entered the service of Austria, with the rank of colonel, in 1683. He was in 1696 appointed commander-in-chief of the imperial army against the Turks, whom he totally defeated at Zenta in 1697, and compelled to accept the peace of Carlowitz in 1699. At the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession, he invaded Italy, defeated Catinat at Carpi and Villeroi at Chiari in 1701, and fought a drawn battle with Vendôme at Luzzara in 1702. After suppressing an insurrection under the younger Rakoczy in Hungary, he joined Marlborough in Germany, where their allied forces defeated the French and Bavarians at Blenheim Aug. 13, 1704. He returned to Flanders, took charge in person over Matsin and the Duke of Orleans at Turin, sept. 7, 1706, he expelled the French from Italy. In cooperation with Marlborough in the Netherlands and in northern France, he won the battle of Oudenarde in 1708, captured Lille in 1708, and gained the victory of Malplaquet in 1709. He negotiated the peace of Rastadt with France in 1714. The war with the Turks having broken out anew, he defeated the latter at Peterwarden in 1716 and at Belgrad in 1717, and forced them to accept the peace of Passarowitz in 1718.

Eugénie Grandet (ė-zhā-nē' gron-dā'). A novel by Balzac, written in 1833, published in 1834. The heroine, Eugénie, is sacrificed to the cold-blooded avariciousness of her father. This is one of Balzac's best novels.

Eugenius (ū-jẹ'ni-us) I., Saint. [See Eugene.] Born at Rome; died there, June 1, 657. Pope 654–657.

Eugenius II. Born at Rome; died there, Aug. 27, 827. Pope 824–827.

Eugenius III. Born at Pisa, Italy; died at Tivoli, Italy, July 8, 1153. Pope 1145–53. He was crowned at Viterbo, appointed, which, compelled by the preaching of Arnold of Brescia, sought to restore the ancient republic; and was enabled by the aid of Roger of Sicily to return in 1149. Compelled in the following year to abandon Rome once more, he afterward lived mostly at Segni. During his reign the second Crusade took place (1147–49, chiefly through the instrumentality of his teacher, St. Bernard of Clairvaux.

Eugenius IV. (Gabriel Condolmieri). Born at Venice, 1383; died at Rome, Feb. 23, 1447. Pope 1431–47. He became involved in a contest with the Council of Basel (opened March 12, 1431). Having ordered the dissolution of this body and the convening of another council at Bologna in 1437, he was cited in 1438 by the Council of Basel, which set up an antipope in the person of Felix V., the schism thus produced continuing till the death of Eugenius. He signed with the emperor John Palæologus a convention for the reunion of the Greek and Latin churches in 1439.

Eugenius. In Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," the friend and mentor of Yorick.

Eugippius, or Eugyppius (ū-jip'i-us). An Italian monk. He was a pupil of St. Severinus of Noricum, whose remains were brought about 488 to Castrum Lucullanum, near Naples, there to form the nucleus of an abbey of which he himself became the second abbot. He wrote a life of St. Severinus (511), which is an important source of early German history.

Eugubine (ū'gū-bin) Tables. [From the place of their discovery, the ancient Iguvium, later Eugubium, modern Gubbio.] Seven bronze tablets containing inscriptions, discovered near Gubbio, Italy, in 1444, and now preserved there. They form the chief monument of the ancient Umbrian language. Four of the tablets are wholly Umbrian, one is partly Umbrian and partly Latin, and two are Latin. The inscriptions relate to the acts of a corporation of priests, and contain the names of several deities otherwise unknown.

Eulalia (ū-lā'li-ạ), Saint. [Gr. Εὐλαλία, fair speech; F. Eulalie.] A Roman virgin martyr, tortured to death during the persecution of Diocletian in 308.

Eulenspiegel (oi'len-spē-gel). Till or Tyll. [G., 'owl-glass.'] The name of a German of the 14th century who was probably born at Kneitlingen, near Brunswick, and buried at Mölln (according to a history of his life written in North Germany in 1483 and translated into High German and printed about 1550). Only a small part of the deeds attributed to him are possibly his own. The name is merely the center about which have been grouped popular tales describing the mischievous pranks of a vagabond of peasant origin. The stories have been widely translated. A recent edition is that of Leipsic 1849, by Lappenberg, who erroneously assumes Thomas Murner to have been the author of the book.

Euler (oi'ler), Leonhard. Born at Basel, Switzerland, April 15, 1707; died at St. Petersburg, Sept. 7 (O. S.), 1783. A celebrated Swiss mathematician. He was a pupil, at Basel, of Jean Bernoulli. On the invitation of the empress Catherine he went to St. Petersburg, where he became (1730) professor of physics, and later (1733) succeeded Daniel Bernoulli in the academy. During the latter years of his life he was partly and in the end wholly blind, but continued his elaborate calculations mentally. He published "Mechanica" (1736-42), "Theoria motuum planetarum et cometarum" (1744), "Introductio in analysin infinitorum" (1748) "Institutiones calculi differentialis" (1755), "Institutiones calculi integralis" (1768-70), "Dioptrica" (1769-71), "Anleitung zur Algebra" (1770), "Opera analytica" (1783-1830), "Lettres à une princesse d'Allemagne" (1768-72), etc.

Eumæus (ū-mē'us). [Gr. Εὐμαιος.] The faithful swineherd of Ulysses, a character in the Odyssey.

Eumenes (ū-mē'nēz). [Gr. Εὐμενης.] Born at Cardia, Thrace, about 361 B. C.: put to death in Gabiene, Elymais, 316 B. C. One of the successors of Alexander the Great. He defeated Craterus in 321, and was betrayed by his soldiers to Antigonus.

Eumenes II. Died 159 (?) B. C. King of Pergamus 197–159 (?) B. C. He was the son of Attalus, whom he succeeded. He assisted the Romans against the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Antiochus the Great. He was present in person at the decisive battle of Magnesia, and, on the restoration of peace, was rewarded by the additions of Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia Epictetus to his kingdom. He was a patron of learning, and founded at Pergamus one of the famous libraries of antiquity.

His bronzes on symmetry and color were much used by Pliny in the compilation of his 35th book. Julian ranks his sculpture with that of Phidias, Alcamenes, and Myron, and his painting with that of Apelles, Parrhasius, and Nicias.

Euphrasia (ū-frā'zhiē). [Gr. Εὐφρασία, of good cheer.] The Grecian Daughter in Murphy's tragedy of that name. She is the daughter of Evander, a king of Sicily, who is imprisoned and starved by the tyrant Dionysius. She accuses him with guilt from her own breast, and finally stabs the tyrant and restores her father to his throne.

Euphrates (ū-frā'tēz). [Assyr. Puratti, Heb. Perath, OPers. Ufrates, Ar. Furat, Gr. Εὐφρατης, Εὐφράτης.] A great Mesopotamian river which has its origin in the Armenian mountains. It is formed from the East Euphrates (Murad-su), which rises northeast of Erzerum, and a branch rising northwest of Lake Van. The united river then passes with a great westward, breaks through the mountain-chain of the Taurus, enters the terrace region at the modern Birejik, and forms a meandering course toward the Tigris. In the neighborhood of Bagdad these two rivers approach one another, and there the Babylonian canal-system begins. In its lower course, below Babylon, the Euphrates has greatly altered its bed, shifting more and more toward the west. According to notices in classical authors, continued by the investigations, it came in ancient time nearer Sippara (Sepharvaim) and Babylon (Hillah) and Uruk (modern Warka) than now; and it did not empty into the sea, united with the Tigris, through the Shatt-el-Arab, as at present. As late as the time of Nebuchadnezzar (626–561 B. C.) and his successors, the twin rivers flowed separately into the Persian Gulf, which extended then at least as far as Babylon. Babylon has quite rightly termed "the gift of Euphrates and Tigris." The soil is formed from the alluvial deposits of these rivers, and this formation still continues. During the winter months the Euphrates has but little water in its bed; but in the spring, and especially when the summer solstice, it swells by the melting of the snow of the mountains, which often causes disastrous floods. In Gen. ii. 14 the Euphrates is mentioned as one of the four rivers of paradise.

Euphronius (ū-frō'ni-us). In Shakspere's "Antony and Cleopatra," an ambassador from Antony to Cæsar.

Euphrosyne (ū-fros'i-nē). [Gr. Εὐφροσυνη, mirth.] 1. In Greek mythology, one of the three Charites or Graces.—2. An asteroid, No. 31) discovered by Ferguson at Washington, Sept. 2, 1854.

Euphues (ū'fū-ēz), or the Anatomy of Wit. [Gr. Εὐφυης, well-grown, goodly.] A novel by John Lyly, published in 1578–79. This book and its successor, "Euphues and his England," published 1580, is looked into nowadays more for the use the affected jargon, full of conceits and extravagances, used by the gallants of Elizabeth's court. Euphues is an Athenian youth who combines the qualities implied in his name. He is elegant, handsome, generous, and loving. "Rosalynde, or Euphues's Golden Legacy" is a similar novel by Thomas Lodge. See Euphuism.

Euphues, his Censure to Philautus, etc. A pamphlet by Robert Greene, published in 1587, and intended as a continuation of Lyly's "Euphues."

Euphues Shadow, the Battaile of the Senses. A pamphlet by Thomas Lodge, edited by Greene and published in 1592.

Eupolis (ū-pō'lis). [Gr. Εὔπολις.] An Athenian comic poet (born 449 B. C.), a contemporary and rival of Aristophanes. He is said to have been drowned in the battle of Cynossema, 410 B. C.

That he [Eupolis] was brilliant in his wit and refined in his style, is plain from the fact that he co-operated with Aristophanes in his "Knights," of which the last parabasis, beginning from v. 1296, is recorded by the scholiast to have been his composition. He afterwards may have quarrelled with Aristophanes, for they satirised one another freely. In style and humour he stood nearest to his great rival and his comedies seem to have possessed most, if not all, of the features which make the Aristophanic comedy so peculiar in literature.

Eupompus (ū-pom'pus). [Gr. Εὔπομπος.] Born at Sicyon: lived in the 4th century B. C. A Greek painter, founder of the so-called Sicyonian school of painting. The work of Eupompus and his successor Pamphilus was to introduce the characteristics of Doric sculpture into painting.

Eurasia (ū-rā'shiä or -zhiä). [Eur(ope) and Asia.] The continental mass made up of Europe and Asia: not generally recognized as a geographical designation.

Eure (ėr). A department of France, capital Evreux, forming part of the old province of Normandy. It is bounded by Seine-Inférieure on the north, Oise and Seine-et-Oise on the east, Eure-et-Loir on the south, Orne on the southwest, and Calvados on the west. Area, 2,230 square miles. Population (1891), 340,471.

Eure. A river of northern France which joins the Seine 10 miles south of Rouen. Length, about 120 miles.

Eure-et-Loir (ėr'ā-lwär'). A department of France, capital Chartres, formed from parts of the ancient Orléanais, Perche, and Normandy. Its boundaries are Eure on the north, Seine-et-Oise on the east, Loiret on the southeast, Loir-et-Cher and Sarthe on the south, and Orne on the west. It has been called "the granary of France." Area, 2,307 square miles. Population (1891), 284,683.

Eureka (ū-rē'kä). The county-seat of Eureka County, Nevada, situated about lat. 38° 30′ N., long. 116° 57′ W. It has silver- and lead-mines. Population (1890), 1,609.

Eureka. A seaport city, the capital of Humboldt County, California, situated on Humboldt Bay in lat. 40° 48′ N., long. 124° 10′ W. Population (1890), 4,858.

Euric (ū'rik), or Evaric (ev'a-rik), L. Evaricus (ev-a-ri'kus). Died 484 or 485 A. D. A king of the West Goths. He was a younger son of Theodoric I., and obtained the government in 466 by the murder of his brother Theodoric II. He conquered the whole of the Spanish peninsula, with the exception of the northwestern corner, which he allowed the Suevic kings to hold as his vassals, and destroyed the small remnant of Roman dominion in Gaul, thereby raising the West-Gothic kingdom to its highest point of power.

Euripides (ū-rip'i-dēz). [Gr. Εὐριπίδης.] Born in Salamis, probably Sept. 23, 480 B. C.; died in 406 B. C. A celebrated Athenian tragic poet. He was the son of Mnesarchus and Cleito, who appear to have fled from Athens to Salamis on the invasion of Xerxes, and was, according to popular tradition, born in that island on the day of the battle of Salamis. He studied physics under Anaxagoras and rhetoric under Prodicus, and at about the age of twenty-five produced the "Peliades." The first of his plays which was acted. He is said to have gained the first prize in five dramatic contests, the first of which occurred in 441. He left Athens for the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, about 408, owing, it is said, to the ridicule thrown upon him by the populace in consequence of the attacks of Aristophanes. The reception of the poet at the Macedonian court (according to doubtful tradition) being torn to pieces by a pack of hounds set upon him by two rival poets, Arrhidæus and Crateuas (or Nicomachus) and was buried with great pomp by Archelaus, who erected a cenotaph in honor of the Athenians for his remains. He wrote 75 plays, of which the following 18 are extant: "Alcestis," "Medea," "Hippolytus," "Heca," "Andromache," "Ion," "Supplicants," "Heracleidæ," "Heracles Mainomenos," "Iphigenia among the Tauri," "Troades," "Helena," "Phœnissæ," "Electra," "Orestes," "Iphigenia at Aulis," "Bacchæ," and "Cyclops."

Euripus (ū-ri'pus). [Gr. Εὔριπος, a narrow channel, esp. the one here mentioned.] The narrowest portion of the channel which separates Eubœa from the mainland. Width at the narrowest part, opposite Chalcis, 120 feet. It is remarkable for its changes of current.

The name Euripus applies, strictly speaking, only to the very narrowest part of the channel between Eubœa and the mainland (Thucyd. vii. 29; Strab. ix. 395), which is opposite to the modern town of Egripo, where the bridge now stands. Herod. viii. 176, 536, note.

Europa (ū-rō'pä), or Europe (-pē). [See Europe.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Phœnix, or of Agenor, sister of Cadmus, and mother by Zeus of Minos and Rhadamanthus. She was borne over the sea to Crete by Zeus, who assumed the form of a white bull. See Io.

The bull, whose form was assumed by Zeus in order to carry off Europa, a Phenician damsel, was sent to be the bull of Asia, the Semitic Heaven god, the same bull which we recognize in the constellation Taurus; and Europa, the "broad-faced" maiden, is only another form of Dêr, the broad-faced moon, instead of being identical with Ursasi, the Vedic dawn-maiden.

Europa and the Bull. A painting by Titian (1562), in Cobham Hall, near Rochester, England. Europa is being carried through the waves on the bull's back; one Cupid flies overhead by a dolphin, and two fly above. Europa's maidens are seen on the distant shore.

Europe (ū'rōp). [From Semitic ereb, darkness, evening, properly sunset, 'the land of the setting sun'; Gr. Εὐρωπη, L. Europa.] 1. The smallest grand division of the eastern continent. It is bounded by the Arctic Sea on the north, the Atlantic on the west, and the Sea of Marmora, Black Sea, and the Mediterranean on the south. On the east its boundaries toward Asia are generally taken as the Caucasus, the Caspian, the Ural River, the Ural Mountains, and the Kara, Lenghi, southwest and northeast, 3,400 miles. Breadth, north and south, 2,400 miles. It lies within lat. 71° 11′ N. (North Cape) and lat. 35° 59′ N. (Cape Tarifa), and long. 9° 31′ W. and long. 66° E. Population ("Bevölkerung der Erde," 1891), 357,379,000. In literature the name occurs first in the Homeric hymn to Apollo, and denotes there the country north of the Peloponnesus, i. e. Thracia. The knowledge of Europe possessed by the ancients was, as in all geographical matters very deficient. It started from the coasts of the Mediterranean, and remained for a long time confined to the three southern peninsulas and the shores of the Euxine. In Herodotus the Phasis is considered as the boundary between Asia and Europe. Later it is the Tanais. The interior of Spain, Gaul, and the countries north of the Alps were opened only through the Roman conquests. Scandinavia and northern Sarmatia remained in obscurity throughout antiquity. From a geographical point of view Europe is a large peninsula set forth by asia to the west. It is a grand division of the globe. not so much from its large extent as from its having long been the center of human culture and civilization. Its geographical conditions also gave it an advantage over the other parts of the globe. It is characterized by a certain symmetry and proportion, and by a rich variety of geological, geographical, and climatic conditions.

Europe, as a geographical term, not improbably designated at first merely the plain of Thebes.
Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 19, note.

2. A province of the later Roman Empire, immediately about Constantinople. Freeman.

Eurotas (ū-rō'tas). [Gr. Εὐρώτας, prob. 'black river.'] In ancient geography, a river of Laconia, Greece, flowing into the Mediterranean 25 miles southeast of Sparta: the modern Iri or Iris. Length, about 45 miles.

Euryanthe (ū-ri-an'thē). An opera by Weber, first produced at Vienna in 1823.

Eurybiades (ū-ri-bī'a-dēz). The leader of the Spartan naval contingent, and nominal commander of the united fleet of the allied Greek states, in the defensive campaign in 480 B. C. against the Persians, whom he defeated in the battles of Artemisium and Salamis.

Eurydice (ū-rid'i-sē). [Gr. Εὐρυδίκη.] In Greek mythology, the wife of Orpheus. She died from the bite of a serpent, whereupon Orpheus descended into Hades, and by the charms of his lyre persuaded Pluto to restore her to life. He did this on condition that she should walk behind her husband, who should not look back until both had arrived in the upper world. Orpheus, overcome by anxiety, turned round only to behold her caught back into the infernal regions.

Eurydice. 1. Wife of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Philip.—2. A Macedonian princess, granddaughter of Perdiccas III. of Macedonia.

Eurydice. 1. An opera by Caccini and Peri, first produced at Florence in 1595. The words were by Rinuccini, and this, with "Dafne" by the same composers, was the beginning of modern opera. See Daphne.

2. A tragedy by Mallet, produced Feb. 22, 1731, at Drury Lane, and revived in 1759.

Eurymedon (ū-rim'ē-don). [Gr. Εὐρυμέδων.] Killed near Syracuse, 413 B. C. An Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war.

Eurymedon. A small river in Pisidia and Pamphylia, Asia Minor, which flows into the Mediterranean: the modern Capri-Su. Near its mouth, 466 or 465 B. C., the Greeks under Cimon defeated the Persian fleet and army.

Eurynome (ū-rin'ō-mē). [Gr. Εὐρυνόμη.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus. According to Hesiod she was the mother, by Zeus, of the Charites or Graces.

Eusebians (ū-sē'bi-anz). The followers of Eusebius of Nicomedia, an Arian bishop of Constantinople in the 4th century A. D. See Arians.

Eusebius (ū-sē'bi-us) of Cæsarea, surnamed Pamphili. [From Gr. εὐσεβής, pious.] Born probably at Cæsarea, Palestine, about 264 A. D.; died there, about 349. A celebrated theologian and historian, sometimes called "the Father of Church History." He was appointed bishop of Cæsarea, and, in 325, attended the Council of Nicæa, where he was appointed to receive the emperor Constantine with a panegyrical oration, and to sit at his right hand. His complete works have been edited by Migne (1856-57).

Eusebius of Dorylæum. A Greek theologian of the 5th century. He held some office about the imperial court at Constantinople when he took holy orders, and composed, at the head of a controversy with Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople. He subsequently became bishop of Dorylæum, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Eutychians.

Eusebius of Emesa. Died at Antioch about 360 A. D. An ecclesiastic of the Greek Church. He was a native of Edessa in Mesopotamia, and became bishop of Emesa in Syria. He wrote several books engendered by Origenism, which are now lost. A number of homilies commonly attributed to him are probably spurious.

Eusebius of Nicomedia. Died at Constantinople, 342 A. D. An Arian bishop who held in succession the sees of Berytus, Nicomedia, and Constantinople. He was banished from Nicomedia in consequence of a refusal to sign the condemnation of Arius pronounced by the Council of Nicæa in 325, but was restored through the influence of Constantia, sister of Constantine. He procured the convening of the Council of Tyre which condemned Athanasius in 334, and effected the restoration of Arius.

Eusebius of Samosata. Died about 379. An orthodox prelate. He became bishop of Samosata, his native place, probably before 361 A. D. He refused, contrary to the emperor's command, to give up some documents intrusted to him proving the election of Meletius as bishop of Antioch, which were demanded by the Arians for the purpose of annulling the election. He was banished about 361, but was restored in 378. He was killed by an Arian who threw a stone at him from the roof of a house.

Euskirchen (oi̯s'kēr-ḥen). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, near the Ertz 22 miles south by west of Cologne. Population (1900), 8,820.

Eustace (ūs'tas) the Monk. [From Gr. στάσις, steadfast, strong; ML. Eustathius, F. Eustache, Eustathe, It. Eustazio, Eustachio.] A French freebooter of the 13th century. He was for a time steward of the count of Boulogne, and eventually became the leader of a band of pirates who fought in turn for France and for England, according as their interest was best served. He was captured while burning a squadron to the port of Louis, son of Philip Augustus, who had been proclaimed king of England, and was executed as a pirate and traitor. He was long remembered on the coasts of France and England for his exploits and daring exploits, and is the hero of a ballad written shortly after his death, which attributes to him the power of magic.

Eustache (ès-tàsh'). St. A large church in Paris, of unique architecture, begun in 1532 upon the constructive principles of the late-Pointed style, but with the exterior forms and decoration of the Renaissance. The arches are semicircular, the buttresses are classed pilasters, and the piers are superposed columns. The columns and arches of the interior is well proportioned and impressive: it has double aisles, and is 345 feet long and 144 wide. The nave is 108 feet high. There are excellent frescos in the chapels.

Eustachio (u-sta'ki-o), or Eustachius (us-ta'ki-us), Bartolommeo. Born at San Severino, Ancona, Italy: died Aug., 1574. An Italian anatomist, professor of anatomy at Rome, and physician to the Pope. He described the Eustachian tube and Eustachian valve. His "Tabulæ anatomicæ" was published in 1714.

Eustathians (us-ta'thi-anz). 1. The orthodox faction in Antioch in the 4th century A. D., who objected to the replacing of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, by an Arian.—2. An extreme ascetic sect of the 4th century A. D., probably so called from Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste in Pontus.

Eustathius (ūs-tā'thi-us) of Antioch. [Gr. Εὐστάθιος. See Eustace.] Born at Side, Pamphylia: died at Philippi, Macedonia, about 340 (?). A Greek prelate, an opponent of Arianism.

Eustathius of Thessalonica. Born at Constantinople; died at Thessalonica, 1198. A Greek classical scholar and religious reformer, archbishop of Thessalonica. He drew up a valuable commentary on Homer which "besides serving to elucidate the Greek language by many important criticisms, drawn from sources that have since been lost, contains, like the works of the Greek lexicographers, innumerable references to the Greek classics and thus furnishes the means of ascertaining the integrity and the genuineness of the text of those classics as they are now extant" (Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 80).

Eustis (ūs'tis), William. Born at Cambridge, Mass., June 10, 1753: died at Boston, Feb. 6, 1825. An American physician and politician. He was secretary of war 1809-12, and governor of Massachusetts 1823-25.

Evald (ā'väld), Johannes. Born at Copenhagen, Nov. 18, 1743: died at Copenhagen, March 17, 1781. A celebrated Danish lyric poet. He studied theology at the University of Copenhagen, but left suddenly to enter the Prussian military service. He soon, however, deserted to the Austrians, and after a year and a half again deserted and returned to Copenhagen and resumed his studies. His first work "Fiskernes Drøm" ("The Dream of the Fishermen") was published in 1769; a prose tragedy, "Rolf Krage," in 1770. In 1774 appeared the tragedy "Balders Død" ("Balder's Death"), the first Danish drama written in imitation pentameter. His greatest work, "Fiskerne" ("The Fishermen"), written in 1778, is a dramatized description of fisher life. It contains some of his best lyrics, among them "Kong Kristian stod ved høien Mast" ("King Christian stood by the lofty Mast"), which has become a national song. He left an incompleted autobiography. Johannes Ewalds Levnet og Meninger ("Johannes Ewald's Life and Opinions"). His complete works, "Samtlige Skrifter, appeared in Copenhagen 1808-09, 6 vols.

Evan (ev'an). See the extract.

The story of the King of Thule next appears in a legal form, familiar to the student of Blackstone. Both shape it records the oppression of a Welsh king, or King Evan the Third, or "Evan the Sixteenth, according to various versions, who at some time before the Christian era made a law appropriating the wife of her husband to himself; but, after a quarrel which lasted for about a hundred years, the barbarous tribute was, at the request of King Malcolm's queen, commuted for a money payment. It has since been discovered after much research that the ancient king, his law and its repeal, are all equally mythical. But the story remained down to recent times the stock example of the horrors of the feudal system.
Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 84.

Evander (ē-van'der). [Gr. Εὐάνδρα.] In classical legend, a son of Hermes, and the leader of an Arcadian colony into Latium 60 years before the Trojan war.

Eve (ēv). [ME. Eve, AS. Ēfe, Ēf. Eve, Sp. Pg. It. Eva, G. Eva, LL. Eva, Heva, Gr. Eúa, Heúa (in LXX translated Zoḗ, life), Ar. Ḥawwā, Heb. Ḥavvāh, living, life.] The first woman, the mother of the human race, according to the account of the creation in Genesis.

Evelina (ev-e-lī'nä). [Dim. of Eva, Eve.] A novel by Madame d'Arblay (Frances Burney), published in 1778, named from its principal character.

It was for a long time believed that Miss Burney was only seventeen when she wrote "Evelina." If so, it was indeed an extraordinary book; but the question depended upon the exact period of her birth; and when Croker edited "Boswell's Life of Johnson," he took the pains, most properly and naturally one would think, to ascertain the fact by examining the parish register of the town where she was born, and it turned out that she was twenty-six when "Evelina" was published.

Evelyn (ev'e-lin), John. Born at Wotton, Surrey, England, Oct. 31, 1620: died at Wotton, Feb. 27, 1706. An English author. He was the second son of Richard Evelyn; was admitted a student at the Middle Temple in 1637; and received the honorary degree of D. C. L. in 1669. The years 1641–47 he passed principally in travel, with occasional returns to England. For a short time he joined the king's army. He was a strong Royalist, and in 1659 published a translation of La Mothe le Vayer's "Of Liberty and Servitude," with a Royalist preface, for which he was "threatened." In 1652, thinking the cause of the Royalists hopeless, he settled at Sayes Court, Deptford, the estate of his wife's father, Sir Richard Browne, ambassador at Paris. He lived here till 1694, when he went to live with his elder brother. At the death of the latter, in 1699, the estate became his, and he passed the rest of his life here. At both places he devoted himself to gardening. He was in favor at court after the Restoration, and held some minor offices. He was much interested in the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow in 1661, one of the council in 1662, secretary 1672. He obtained for it the Arundelian library in 1678, and for the University of Oxford the Arundelian marbles in 1667, both from the Duke of Norfolk. He was treasurer of Greenwich Hospital from 1695 to 1703. Among his works are "The State of France, etc." (1652), "A Character of England" (1659), "Apology for the Royal Party, etc." (1659), "Fumifugium (1661), "Sculptura, etc." (1662), "Chalcographia, etc." (1664), "Kalendarium Hortense" (1664), "Numismata, etc." (1693), "The Complete Gardener" (translated from the French of Quintinie, 1693), etc. His memoirs, first published in 1818–19, edited by William Bray, contain his letters and diary.

Evemerus (ē-vem'e-rus), or Euemerus (ū-em'e-rus), or Euhemerus (ū-hem'e-rus). [Gr. Eὐήμερος.] Lived in the second half of the 4th century B. C. A Greek mythographer. He wrote a "Sacred History" (Ἱερὰ Ἀναγραφή), in which he gave an anthropomorphic explanation of current mythology.

The most famous of the later theories was that of Euemerus (316 B. C.). In a kind of philosophical romance, Euemerus declared that he had sailed to some Northern Island, Panchaia, where he found the deity about mythical times engraved on pillars of bronze. This truth he published in the Sacra Historia, where he rationalised the fables, asserting that the gods had been men, and that the myths were exaggerated and distorted records of facts.
Lang, Myth., etc., I. 15.

Evening's Love, An, or The Mock Astrologer. A comedy by Dryden, acted and printed in 1668. It was taken in part from the younger Corneille's "Le feint astrologue," a version of "El astrologo fingido" (by Calderon), and from Molière's "Dépit amoureux."

Exeter (eks'e-tėr). [ME. Exeter, Exestre, Excestre, AS. Exanceaster, Exanceaster, city of (on) the Exe.] 1. A cathedral city, the capital of Devonshire, England, on the Exe, near its mouth, in lat. 50° 43′ N., long. 3° 31′ W. It is a seaport, and has some foreign trade. It manufactures gloves and agricultural machinery. It is said to be the oldest English city having continuous existence. It was taken by William I. in 1068, was unsuccessfully besieged by Perkin Warbeck in 1497 and by Cornish insurgents in 1549, and was taken by Prince Maurice in 1643, and by Fairfax in 1646. The cathedral, which is 408 feet in length by 76 in breadth, was founded in the 12th century, but in its present form dates, except the two Norman transepttowers (with one exception the only example of transepttowers in England), from between 1280 and 1394. The west front presents a strange design, its lower portion being an imitation in stone of a wooden screen, with three tiers of statues in niches; above is a large window with good tracery. The interior is rich and effective, with fine arches, vaulting with central rib and very numerous radiating ribs, and interesting medieval tombs and bishop's throne. Population (1891), 37,580.

John Shillingford tells us that Exeter was a walled city before the Incarnation of Christ; and, though it is not likely to have been a walled city in any sense that would satisfy either modern or Roman engineers, it is likely enough to have been already a fortified post before Cæsar landed in Britain. Freeman, Eng. Towns, p. 61.

2. A town in Rockingham County, New Hampshire, situated on the Exeter River 13 miles southwest of Portsmouth. It is the seat of Phillips Academy (which see). Population (1890), 4,284.

Exeter Book, The. [L. Codex Exoniensis.] A collection of Anglo-Saxon poems given by Bishop Leofric to the library of the cathedral of Exeter, England, between 1046 and 1073. It "contains pieces apparently detached which are now regarded as forming a connected poem upon Christ, by Cynewulf (hymns to the Saviour, to the Virgin, to the Trinity, on the Nativity, Ascension, and Harrowing of Hell); also hymns of praise and thanksgiving; poems on the Day of Judgment and the Crucifixion, and on Souls after Death; a short sermon in verse; and the 'Legend of St. Guthlac,' a metrical paraphrase of the Latin 'Life of St. Guthlac,' by Felix, a monk of Croyland Abbey" (Morley, Eng. Writers, II. 199). It also contains a paraphrase of the "Song of Hanamiah, Mishael, and Azariah," "The Phœnix," "Legend of St. Juliana," "The Wanderer," "The Seafarer," a poem on Christian morality, "Widsith," "The Wonders of Creation," "The Panther," "The Whale," "The Address of the Soul to the Body," "Song of Deor the Bard," and a collection of riddles. The book was first published by the London Society of Antiquaries in 1842 as "Codex Exoniensis, etc."

Exeter College. A college at Oxford, England, founded by Walter de Stapeldon, bishop of Exeter, in 1314. The endowment was increased by Sir William Petre in 1566. The buildings have been often restored, and are in part modern.

Walter de Stapeldon, Bishop of Exeter, was the founder of the college which now bears the name of that see. In April, 1314, he conveyed the rectory of Gwinear, in Cornwall, to the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, on condition that they should apply the income to the maintenance of twelve scholars studying philosophy at the University; and he purchased for these scholars two houses in the parish of St. Peter in the East, at Oxford, known respectively as Hart Hall and Arthur Hall. The original members of the foundation were placed in Hart Hall, which in consequence received for a while the name of Stapeldon Hall. It was not long, however, before the Bishop resolved to provide them with a more comfortable abode. In October, 1315, he bought a tenement called St. Stephen's Hall, an adjoining tenement called La Lavandrie, and a third to the east of them, situated just within the town wall, between the Turl and Smith Gate. Thither the twelve scholars removed, and the name of Stapeldon Hall was transferred to the little group of buildings which thus became the nucleus of Exeter College. Lyte, Oxford, p. 157.

Exeter Hall. A building on the Strand, London, used for religious, charitable, and musical assemblies. It was purchased for the Young Men's Christian Association in 1880.

Fabius Maximus Rullianus, Quintus. Died about 290 B. C. A Roman general. He was consul six times, the first time in 322 and the last in 295, and was triumphator each. He vanquished the Samnite war against the Samnites, over whom and their allies he gained the decisive victory of Sentinum in 295.

Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, Quintus, surnamed Cunctator ("the Delayer"). Died 203 B. C. A Roman general. He was consul for the first time in 233, when by a victory over the Ligurians he obtained the honor of a triumph. In 218 he was at the head of the legation sent by the Roman senate to demand reparation of Carthage for the attack on Saguntum. After the defeat of the consul Flaminius by Hannibal at Thrasymenus, he was, in 217, appointed dictator. Avoiding pitched battles (whence his surname Cunctator, "delayer"), he weakened the Carthaginians by numerous skirmishes. His satisfaction in so arresting Rome with this method of carrying on the war, until it was passed in the senate dividing the command between the dictator and his master of the horse, Minucius, who engaged with Hannibal, and would have been destroyed if Fabius had not hastened to his assistance. Fabius was succeeded in command by the consuls Paulus Æmilius and Terentius Varro, who, adopting a more aggressive policy, were totally defeated at the battle of Cannæ in 216. It is noted for its manufacture of silk and paper, and formerly of majolica, which is named from it. It has a cathedral and picture-gallery, and is defended by a citadel. It was the birth place of Torricelli. The cathedral (duomo) is a large and handsome Renaissance basilica of 1581, containing some good paintings and sculpture of the time. The shrine of Savino, the earliest local bishop, by Benedetto da Majano (1472), consists of an altar, above which is the sarcophagus, with six reliefs of scenes from the saint's life, and other sculptures. Population (1881), 13,068.

Faerie Queene (fā'e-ri kwēn), or Fairy (fār'i) Queen, The. An allegorical poem of chivalry by Edmund Spenser. The original plan comprised 12 books, of these I.–III. were published in 1590, and IV.–VI. in 1596. Fragments of later books were published in 1611.

Spenser's letter to Raleigh appended to the fragment of "The Faerie Queene," "expounding his whole intention in the course of this work," said only that "he fashioned to pourtraict in Arthure, before he was king, the image of a brave knight, perfected in the twelve moral vertues, as Aristotle hath devised, the which is the purpose of the first twelve bookes; which if I finde may be well accepted, I may be perhaps encouraged to frame the other part, of politicke vertues, in his person after that hee came to be king." It was left for the reader to discover how grand a design was indicated by these unassuming words. Spenser said that by the Faerie Queene, whom Arthur sought, "I meane glory in my generall intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our soveraine the queene, and her kingdom in Faery land." Morley, English Writers, IX. 317.

Twelve knights, representing twelve virtues, were to have been sent on adventures from the Court of Gloriana, Queen of Fairyland. The six finished books give the legends (each subdivided into twelve cantos, averaging fifty or six hundred stanzas each) of Holiness, Temperance, Chastity, Friendship, Justice, and Courtesy: while a fragment of two spiendid "Cantos on Mutability" is supposed to have belonged to a seventh book (not necessarily occupying it in order) on Constancy. Legend has it that the poem was actually completed; but this seems improbable, as the first three books were certainly ten years in hand, and the second three six more. The existing poem, comprehending some four thousand stanzas, or between thirty and forty thousand lines, exhibits so many and such varied excellences that it is difficult to believe that the poet could have done anything new in kind.

Falkland. A romance by Bulwer Lytton, published anonymously in 1827.

Falkland. The principal character in Godwin's novel "Caleb Williams." His chief thought is to preserve his honor from stain. He stabs his enemy Tyrrel in the back in a moment of passion, and allows two innocent persons to hang for the murder. From that time his desire is for concealment. Caleb Williams, his secretary, discovers the secret, and is pursued by the hirelings of Falkland. He finally causes the latter, who confesses the crime and dies of shame. In "The Iron Chest," a dramatization by Colman, he is Sir Edward Mortimer.

The character of Falkland, the chief actor, which is formed on visionary principles of honour, is perhaps not strictly an invention, as it closely resembles that of Shamont in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Nice Valour." But the accumulated wretchedness with which he is overwhelmed, the inscrutable mystery by which he is surrounded, and the frightful persecutions to which he subjects the suspected possessor of his dreadful secret are peculiar to the author, and are represented with a force which has not been surpassed in the finest passages and scenes of poetic or dramatic fiction.

It was originally brought out in Berlin in 1849 under the name "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor" ("The Merry Wives of Windsor").

3. An opera by Verdi, produced at Milan Feb. 9, 1893.

Falstaff, Sir John. A celebrated character in Shakspere's historical play "Henry IV." (1st and 2d parts), and also in "The Merry Wives of Windsor." He is a very fat, sensual, and witty old knight: a swindler, drunkard, and good-tempered liar and something of a coward. Falstaff was originally called Sir John Oldcastle. The first actor of the part was John Heminge.

> Shakespeare found the name of John Oldcastle in the old play of "Henry V.": in the Chronicle he found John Oldcastle, who was page to the Duke of Norfolk who played a part in "Richard II.", and this, according to Shakespeare, his Falstaff (Oldcastle) had been in his youth. When the poet wrote his "Henry IV." he knew not who Sir John Oldcastle was, whom he had resolved to difline with the designation as Norfolk's page; he was a Lord Cobham (Sir John Oldcastle, known as the good Lord Cobham), who was beheaded as a Lollard and Wickliffite in the persecution of the church under Henry V. The Protestants regarded him as a holy martyr, the Catholics as a heretic: the latter seized with eagerness this description of the fat poltroon, and gave Falstaff as a portrait of Lord Cobham: he was indeed physically and mentally his contrast. The family complained of this misuse of a name dear to them, and Shakspeare declared in the epilogue to "Henry IV." that Cobham was in his sight also a martyr, and that "this was not the man." At the same time, he changed the name to Falstaff, but this was of little use: in spite of the express retractions, subsequent Catholic writers on church history still declared Falstaff to be a portrait of the heretic Cobham. But it is a strange circumstance that even now under the name of Falstaff another historical character is again sought for, just as if it were impossible for such a vigorous form not to be a being of reality. It was referred to John Falstaff, whose remarkable career is enumerated in "Henry VI." than history justifies; and this too met with public blame, although Shakespeare could have again asserted that he intended Falstaffe as Oldcastle.

Farnese Bacchus. A celebrated Greek torso of the 4th century B. C., in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The forms are fine, and the modeling simple yet highly expressive of the voluptuous nature of the god. It is of the school of Praxiteles.

Farnese Bull. A large group of Greek sculpture of the Trallian school (3d century B. C.), in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. It represents the chastisement of Dirce by her stepsons for her treatment of Antiope, grandmother of Amphion to the horns of a bull. It is much restored, but is very remarkable for its composition and execution. It was discovered in the baths of Caracalla in 1546.

Farnese Flora. A celebrated antique statue in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The goddess holds her Ionian tunic with her right hand as she steps forward, the motive being a familiar one in archaic statues of Venus. The picture is remarkable for its grace, despite its height of 11 feet.

Farnese Hercules. A celebrated Greek statue in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The demigod is represented undraped, leaning on his club. The bearded head is somewhat small, and the muscular development ponderous. It dates from the early empire.

Farnese Homer. An antique bust in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. It is admirable in execution, and remarkable for the profound intellectuality of its expression. It is perhaps the finest example of its familiar type, which is that universally associated with Homer.

Farnese Juno. A colossal antique bust of Juno (Hera), in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The expression is one of calm repose, high and unbending. The hair is bound with a simple fillet. It has been demonstrated that this bust is a copy of the type of Polycletus (420 B. C.).

Farnese Minerva. A Greek statue of Pallas (Athene Parthenos), found at Velletri, and now in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The type is that of the great statue of the Parthenon. The goddess wears the Attic helmet with a sphinx and two figures of Pegasus, and the ægis on her breast. The arms are restored: the right is extended to hold the Victory, and the left raised to sustain the spear.

Farnese Palace. A celebrated palace of the Farnese in Rome, founded in the first part of the reign of Leo X. It was begun by San Gallo the younger, was continued by Michelangelo, and was completed by Giacomo della Porta. It is adorned with frescos by Annibale Caracci.

Farragut (far'a-gut), David Glasgow. Born at Campbell's Station, Tenn., July 5, 1801; died at Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 14, 1870. A celebrated American admiral. He was the son of George Farragut, a Spaniard who emigrated to America in 1776 and fought in the Continental army in the Revolutionary War. He was adopted by David Foter, who procured for him an appointment as midshipman in the United States navy in 1809, and under whom he served in the Essex when she was captured by the Phœbe and the Cherub in the harbor of Valparaiso, March 28, 1814. He was promoted lieutenant in 1825, master in 1841, and captain in 1855. In Jan., 1862, he was appointed commander of a naval armament destined, together with a land force under General Benjamin F. Butler, for the reduction of New Orleans. He sailed from Hampton Roads Feb. 2, 1862, and on April 18, 1862, began the bombardment of the lower defenses of New Orleans, Forts Jackson and St. Philip. He passed the forts on the night of April 23–24, and after destroying the Confederate fleet, consisting of gunboats and the iron-clad ram Manassas, compelled the surrender of the city on April 25, which was followed by that of the forts on April 28. He turned the city over to General Butler May 1, 1862. On June 28, 1862 he attacked the batteries at Vicksburg, which he succeeded in passing only to find the city impregnable for attack on the river front. On July 15 he once more ran the batteries, and returned to New Orleans. He was promoted rear-admiral July 16, 1862. On March 14, 1863 he attempted to run the batteries of Port Hudson with a fleet of vessels and gunboats to assist General N. P. Banks in his siege of that place, but succeeded in passing only with his flagship, the Hartford and a gunboat which was lashed to her side. On Aug. 5, 1864, supported by a land force under General Gordon Granger, he passed Forts Morgan and Gaines, at the entrance to Mobile Bay, and after a desperate struggle captured the Confederate ironclad Tennessee. Although unable to capture the city of Mobile, on account of shoal water and obstructions in the channel, the object of his expedition, which was to put an end to the blockade running at Mobile, was effectively accomplished. Forts Gaines and Morgan surrendered soon after. In Dec., 1864, Congress created for him the rank of vice-admiral, and in 1866 that of admiral.

Farrakhabad (fur-ruk-a-bad'), or Farrukhabad, or Furruckabad. 1. A district in the Agra division, Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 27° N., long. 79° 30′ E. Area, 1,718 square miles. Population (1881), 907,608.—2. The capital of the district of Farrakhabad, situated on the Ganges in lat. 27° 23′ N., long. 79° 36′ E. Fashion (fash'on). Sir Novelty. In Cibber's "Love's Last Shift," a coxcomb that loves to be the first in all foppery." Vanbrugh metamorphosed him into Lord Foppington in "The Relapse."

The interest of the audience in Sir Novelty does not center in him as an ingenious fop, but as, however, sufficiently unscrupulous, as it is attracted towards him as a "beau," a man of fashion, who professes to see nothing tolerable in himself, solely in order to excite praise for his unquiescence from others. . . . He is the first man who was ever called "beau," which title he professes to prefer to "right honourable" for the latter is inherited, while the former is owing to his supposed merit and unexampled gallantry. Dibdin, Dict. Stage, II. 20.

Fashion, Tom. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Relapse," the younger brother of Lord Foppington (formerly Sir Novelty Fashion). He personates his brother to get possession of Miss Hoyden and her fortune. See Hoyden.

Fasti (fas'ti). [L. (se. dies, days), pl. of fastus, lit. 'on which one may speak'; used absolutely for a day on which court can be held, a court-day.] See the extract.

The Pontifices, who possessed the art of keeping account of the time, arranged also the first list or list of the days for "awards" or the administration of the law (dicendi dies fasti, this being part of the title of each one thick-bound tome), and, calling these days "fasti," named holidays, sacrifices, etc., falling on each day, to which were gradually joined just the anniversaries of disasters, and then other short notices of historical events as well as observations on the rising and setting of constellations. After these lasti had been made public, private persons also undertook the compilation of fasti in the shape of tables or books, and this is the first origin of historical expositions. After the introduction of the Julian era (709 AU) these publications became again subsidiary, and were made by the Emperor Augustus the property of the state. We possess a number of fragments of calendars which were engraved or written (painted, at Rome and in neighbouring Italian towns, and which, according to the chronology, are to the time of Claudius (from 738 Urbe, before AD. 16). When the new chronology had become sufficiently familiar, the ministry of private persons found there a new field. There arose still two complete calendars in existence, an official one of the 4th century written by Furius Dionysius Philocalus A. D. 354, and a Christian revision of the official calendar engraved by Polemius Silvius (A. D. 448 sq.). From denoting lists of days and months, the name of fasti was also transferred to lists of years containing the chief magistrates (fasti magistratus (fasti consulares), the triumphs held in each year (fasti triumphales), and the priests (fasti sacerdotales). Fragments of facts in the sense of the word have likewise come down to us, and of these the fasti capitolini are by far the most important.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist Rom Lit. tr. by Warr I. 160.

Fasti. A poetical Roman calendar by Ovid.

Fastolf (fas'tolf), Sir John. Born probably in 1378; died at Caister, Norv., 5, 1459. An English soldier and benefactor of Magdalen College, Oxford. He was knighted by the Duke of Norfolk, and afterward entered the service of Thomas of Lancaster, duke of Clarence, Henry IV.'s second son, who became lord-deputy of Ireland in 1401. He was appointed by Henry V. governor of Harfleur, was left in Guienne in 1413, became lieutenant of Normandy and governor of Maine and Anjou in 1425, took John II., duke of Alençon, prisoner at the battle of Verneuil, August 17, 1424, and was created a knight of the Garter in 1426. On July 14, 1429 during Lent, while consuming provisions, consisting chiefly of herrings, to the English camp at Orleans, he repulsed an attack of a largely superior French force under the Comte de Clermont at Rouvray ("the Battle of the Herrings"), and June 18, 1428, was defeated at Patay with Talbot at Patay. He retired to military service in 1440. He left a legacy for the founding of a college at Caister, which was diverted by papal authority to Magdalen college, Oxford. He is supposed to be the original of Shakspere's Sir John Falstaff. See Falstaff.

Fata Morgana (fä'ta mor-ga'na). The fay or fairy Morgana, the sister of King Arthur, in mediæval romances. She lived in the Isle of Avalon, where under the Dame she fell in love with Sir Orlando. Orlando Innamorato she appears as a personification of Fortune. She is subject only to Demogorgon. She is also called "Morgane la Fée," and "Morgan le Fay." The name Fata Morgana is given to a mirage seen in the Strait of Messina, superstitiously supposed to be caused by Morgana.

Fatal Curiosity. 1. An episode in Cervantes's "Don Quixote." It relates to the excessive trial of a wife's faithfulness.—2. A tragedy by Lillo, published in 1737. It has been imitated in "The Shipwreck," and was altered and re-produced by Colman senior, in 1782.

Fathers, The Apostolic. Those fathers of the church who were during any part of their lives contemporary with the apostles. They are six: Barnabas (lived about A. D. 70–100), Clement of Rome (died about A. D. 100), Hermas (lived probably about the beginning of the 2d century), Ignatius (died probably 107), Papias (lived probably about 130), and Polycarp (died 155).

Fathers and Sons. A novel by Turgenieff, published in 1862. In it theoretic nihilism is presented and defined. The destructive skepticism of the medical student Bazaroff, "the new man," in whom Turgenieff portrayed the spirit of a new epoch, aroused much hostility against him.

"A nihilist," said Nicholas Petrovitch, . . . "signifies a man who . . . recognizes nothing." "Or rather who eyes specs—nothing," said Paul Petrovitch. . . . "A man who looks at everything from a critical point of view," said Arcadi. "Does not that come to the same thing?" asked his uncle. "No, not at all; a nihilist is a man who bows before no authority, who accepts no principle without examination, no matter what credit the principle has."
Turgenieff. Fathers and Sons (tr. by Schuyler) x.

Faust (foust). 1. A tragedy by Goethe, commenced in 1772, and published as "Faust, ein Fragment" in 1790. Part I. complete, was published as "Faust, eine Tragödie" in 1808; part 2, finished in 1831, was published in 1833. It has been translated into English by Bayard Taylor, Blackie, Auster, Hayward, Martin, and others (nearly 40 in all). Goethe accomplished the transformation of Faust from a common necromancer and conjurer into a personification of humanity, tempted and disquieted, but at length groping its way to the light. See Goethe.

2. An opera by Gounod (words, after Goethe, by Carré and Barbier), represented at the Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, March 19, 1859.—3. An opera by Spohr, first produced at Frankfort in 1818. The words, which do not follow Goethe's play, are by Bernhard.

Faust (foust). Johann. See Faust.

Faust, or Faustus (fâs'tus), Doctor Johann. A person born at Kundling (Knittlingen), Würtemberg, or at Roda, near Weimar, and said to have died in 1538. He was a man of licentious character, a magician, astrologer, and soothsayer, who boasted of performing the miracles of Christ. It was believed that he was carried off at last by the devil who had lived with him in the form of a black dog. The legends of Faust were gathered from the then recent traditions concerning him in a book which appeared at the Frankfort fair of Michaelmas-Main in 1587. It was called "The History of Dr. Faustus, the Notorious Magician and Master of the Black Art, etc." Soon after its appearance it was translated into English. "A metrical version of it into English was licensed by Aylmer, Bishop of London, before the end of the year. In 1588 there was a second version, and it also appeared as a translation into Low German, and a new edition of the original with some slight changes. In 1589 there appeared a version of the first German Faust book into French, by Victor Palma Cayet. The first Dutch version was made from the second edition of the original, that of 1588, and is undated, but probably was made at once. There was a Frisian edition of it in 1592, and 1592 there was a Dutch translation from the second German edition. This gives the time of the carrying off of Faustus by the devil as the night between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of October 1538. The English version also gives 1538 as the year, and if it is a date, as we have seen, consistent with the only reference to it in actual life. Marlowe's play ("The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus") was probably written in 1588, soon after the original story had found its way to England. He treated the legend as a poet, bringing out with full force the grandeur of man—man in the pride of knowledge turning from his God." (Morley, Eng. Writers IX. 254.) This play was brought to German about the beginning of the seventeenth, and, after passing through various developments on the stage, finally became a puppet-play, which is still in existence. Lessing made perhaps the two versions of Christopher Marlowe, painter, published two fragments of his dramatized life of Faust in 1778. Goethe's tragedy (which see) was not published till 1808. Klinger published a romance "Faust's Leben, Thaten und Höllenfahrt" (1791). Heidenreich translated it in 1820. Klingemann published a tragedy on the subject (1815). Heine a ballet "Der Doctor Faust, ein Tanzpoem" (1851), and Lenau an epic "Faust" (1836). W. G. Wills adapted a play from Goethe's "Faust," which Henry Irving produced in 1885. Calderon's play "El Magico Prodigioso" (1637) resembles closely Marlowe's play, though founded on the legend of St. Cyprian.

Fausta (fâs'tä). Cornelia. Born about 88 B. C. A daughter of the Roman dictator L. Cornelius Sulla by his fourth wife, Cæcilia Metella. She married at an early age C. Memmius, by whom she was divorced. In 54 B. C. she married T. Annius Milo. She was notorious for her conjugal infidelity. The historian Sallust is said to have been one of her paramours.

Fausta, Flavia Maximiana. Died probably in 326. A Roman empress, daughter of the emperor Maximianus Herculius. She married in 307 Constantine the Great, by whom she was the mother of Constantinus, Constantius, and Constans. She is said to have induced Constantine by false accusations to put Crispus, his eldest son by a former wife, to death, and to have been suffocated in a heated bath by order of her husband, in consequence of the discovery of the innocence of Crispus.

Fawcett, John. Born Aug. 29, 1768; died 1837. An English actor and dramatist. He appeared at Covent Garden, London, in 1791, and maintained his connection with that theater until his retirement from the stage in 1832. Many plays were written expressly for him by Colman the younger, the most notable of which was the "Heir at Law," in which he appeared as Dr. Pangloss. He was also the author of "Three-pence a Week" (produced at the Haymarket in 1800), "Peroune" (1804), "Fairies Revel" (produced at the Haymarket in 1802), "The Enchanted Island" (produced at the Haymarket in 1804), etc.

Fawkes (fâks), Guy. Born at York, England, 1570; died Jan. 31, 1606. An English conspirator. He was the son of Edward Fawkes, a notary of the ecclesiastical courts. Guy left England in 1593 for Flanders, where he became a soldier in the Spanish army. He returned to England on the accession of James I., and in 1604 became associated with Catesby, Thomas Percy, Thomas Winter, John Wright, and others in the so-called "gunpowder plot," the object of which was to kill the king and the members of Parliament. The conspirators managed to fill a cellar under the Parliament house with barrels of gunpowder, which was to be exploded by Fawkes at the opening of Parliament, Nov. 5, 1605. He was arrested as he was entering the cellar on the night of Nov. 4–5, and after trial was executed with several of his accomplices.

Fawkner (fâk'nėr), John Pasco. Born Oct. 20, 1792; died Sept. 4, 1869. An Australian journalist. He went from England to Van Diemen's Land in 1804 with his father, a convict. Fayum, or Fayoum (fī-ōm'). A province of Egypt, west of the Nile and southwest of Cairo. It is well watered and very fertile. In the northwest part of it is the large lake Birket el-Karn, and the ancient Lake Mœris (which see) was in it. Area, 493 square miles. Population, 228,709.

Mr. Petrie has brought to light [in the Fayum] the earliest Greek alphabetical signs yet discovered; for the most ancient inscriptions of the Greek language previously known are the rock-cut and the lava cut inscriptions found in the very ancient cemeteries of Santorin and Thera, and the famous rock inscription cut upon the leg of one of the colossi at Abu-Simbel. The Abu-Simbel inscription is contemporaneous with the Forty-seventh Olympiad, and Lenormant attributes the oldest of the Thera inscriptions to the 99th century before Christ. But the potsherds found by Mr. Petrie in the Fayum carry back the history of the alphabet to a period earlier than the date of the Exodus, and six centuries earlier than any Greek inscriptions known. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 79.

Fazio (fät'sē-ō). A tragedy by Dean Milman, first produced, without his knowledge, as "The Italian Wife." In 1815 it was brought out with great success at Covent Garden. The plot is from a story in the "Annual Register" for 1795. See Bonaca.

Ferdinand (fer'di-nand) I., surnamed "The Just." [F. Ferdinand, Fernand; It. Ferdinando, Fernando; Sp. Hernando, Fernando; G. Ferdinand.] Born 1379: died 1416. King of Aragon 1412–16. He was a prominent supporter of the antipope Benedict XIII. at the beginning of the Council of Constance (1414–18), but after the deposition of John XXIII. and the abdication of Gregory XII. he was in 1416 induced by the emperor Sigismund to withdraw his support in the interest of the unity of the church.

Ferdinand II. King of Aragon. See Ferdinand V., King of Castile.

Ferdinand (fer'di-nand; G. pron. fer'dē-nänd) I. Born at Vienna, April 19, 1793: died at Prague, June 29, 1875. Emperor of Austria, son of Francis I. whom he succeeded March 2, 1835. He inherited a weak constitution mentally and physically, which compelled him to abandon the administration of the government to others, especially to the prime minister Metternich, whose sole policy it was to oppose and provoke the revolutions of 1848. He abdicated in favor of his nephew Francis Joseph, Dec. 2, 1848.

Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick. See Brunswick, Duke of (Ferdinand).

Ferdinand I., surnamed "The Great." Died at Leon, Spain, Dec. 27, 1065. King of Castile and Leon. He was the second son of Sancho III. of Navarre, who conquered Castile from Bermudo III. of Leon about 1030. He was invested by his father in 1035 (1037) with the seven cities of Castile, which was created an independent kingdom. He married Doña Sancha, daughter of Alfonso V. of Leon, in 1032, and by her conquered the Asturias, Leon, and Galicia. He gained a brilliant victory over the Moors at Seville in 1054, and in 1055 defeated the Moorish military order of Almoravides (1057), by whom he was declared a tributary.

Ferdinand III., surnamed "The Saint." Born about 1200: died 1252. King of Castile and Leon, son of Alfonso IX. of Leon by Berengaria, sister of Henry I. of Castile. He became king of Castile on the death of Henry in 1217, and succeeded his father as king of Leon in 1230. He captured Ubeda from the Moors in 1234, Cordova in 1236, Murcia in 1246, and Seville in 1248. He was canonized by Clement X. in 1671, and is commemorated on May 30. He caused to be collected and translated into the vulgar tongue the "Forus Judicum," or code of Visigothic laws, which forms one of the oldest specimens of Castilian prose. During his reign Law was passed (1255) which made Leon and Castile a single hereditary kingdom.

Ferdinand IV. Born 1285: died 1312. King of Castile and Leon, son of Sancho IV., whom he succeeded in 1295.

Ferdinand V. (II. of Aragon and Sicily, III. of Naples), surnamed "The Catholic." Born at Sos, Aragon, March 10, 1452: died at Madrigalejo, Estremadura, Spain, Jan. 23, 1516. King of Castile. He was the son of John II. of Navarre and Aragon, who associated him with himself in the government of Aragon in 1466, and in 1468 declared him king of Sicily. In Oct., 1469, he married Isabella, sister of Henry IV. of Castile, princess of the Asturias. Ferdinand and Isabella were, on the death of Henry in 1474, recognized as joint sovereigns of Castile by the nobles and the junta of Segovia, in opposition to the party including the Marquis of Villena, the grand master of Calatrava, and the Archbishop of Toledo, supported by Alfonso V. of Portugal and Louis XI. of France, who declared in favor of Juana (or Beltraneja (q. v.), daughter of Beltrand, whom Henry had in his will acknowledged as his legitimate child and designated as his successor. Ferdinand defeated Alfonso at Toro with the result that the whole of Castile submitted to Isabella and he retained the title. He succeeded his father in Aragon in the same year (Navarre going to his sister Leonora), and in 1475 he undertook the war against the Moors, which resulted in the conquest of Granada in 1492. He joined the Holy League against the French in Italy, Navarre, on the other hand, entered into an alliance with France. The pope now issued a bull excluding Navarre, which was conquered in 1513, and incorporated with Castile in 1515. He thus united under his sway the four kingdoms into which Spain was at this time divided (Aragon, Castile, Granada, and Navarre), besides Sicily and Naples. The chief events of his reign, besides those already mentioned, were the establishment of the Inquisition at Seville (1480), the incorporation with the crown of the grand-mastership of the military orders of Calatrava (1487), Alcantara (1494), and San Jago (1499), the expulsion of the Jews (1492), and the discovery of America by Columbus.

Ferdinand VI. Born Sept. 23, 1712: died at Villaviciosa, Aug. 10, 1759. King of Spain, son of Philip V. whom he succeeded in 1746. He was a party to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct., 1748), which terminated the War of the Austrian Succession (1740–48). He maintained a strict neutrality on the outbreak of the Seven Years' War in 1756, notwithstanding the overtures both of England and of France, the former of which offered Gibraltar and the latter Minorca as the price of his assistance. Of a weak constitution and a melancholy temperament, he withdrew as far as practicable from European politics, abandoning the government to his ministers Ensenada, Carvajal, and Wall, who took into their counsels the queen Barbara, daughter of John V. of Portugal, the royal confessor Rabaga, and the singer Farinelli, who acquired an extraordinary influence over the king. On the death of the queen in 1758, he fell into an extreme melancholy, which developed into insanity.

Ferdinand VII. Born at San Ildefonso, near Madrid, Oct. 14, 1784: died at Madrid, Sept.

Ferdinand VII.

29, 1833. King of Spain, son of Charles IV. He succeeded the throne March 19, 1808, a popular revolution at Aranjuez having compelled his father to abdicate. On May 6, 1808, he was forced by Napoleon to renounce his throne, and was interned at Valencay until March, 1814, when he returned to Spain. He abolished the liberal constitution of 1812, restored the Inquisition, and complied ostensibly with the demands of the Absolutist or Apostolical party. A revolution restored (March 9, 1820) the constitution of 1812, which was abolished through French intervention in 1823. He established the Salic law by the pragmatic sanction of March 29, 1830. See Carlos, Don (Carlos Maria Isidro de Borbon).

Ferdinand I. Born at Alcalá, Spain, March 10, 1503; died at Vienna, July 25, 1564. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, younger brother of the emperor Charles V. He married in 1521 the princess Anna of Hungary, on the death of whose brother, Louis II., in 1526, he was elected king of Bohemia and Hungary. His rule for the thus-united Hungary was disputed by John Zapolya, who, supported by the Turks, obtained possession of a part of the country. He became in 1531 president of the council of regency appointed to govern Germany during the emperor's absence in Spain, was elected king of the Romans in 1531 and became emperor on the abdication of Charles in 1556. He exerted himself, but with little success, to settle the religious disputes between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics in Germany. He re-granted the treaty between the Catholics and the Protestants of Augsburg in 1552.

Ferdinand II. Born at Gratz, Styria, July 9, 1578; died at Vienna, Feb. 15, 1637. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was the son of Charles, duke of Styria, by Maria of Bavaria, and cousin of Matthias, whom he succeeded in Styria, in Bohemia in 1617, as king of Hungary in 1618, and as emperor in 1619. In 1619 he was deposed from the throne of Bohemia by the Protestant estates of that kingdom, who were irritated by infringements of their "Majestätsbrief" of 1609, and who chose as his successor the elector palatine Frederick V., head of the Protestant Union and of the German Calvinists. He allied himself with Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, head of the Catholic League, with Spain, and with the Lutheran elector of Saxony, and their combined forces having gained a decisive victory over the Bohemians in the battle on the White Hill, near Prague (Nov. 8, 1620), he destroyed the "Majestätsbrief," and established Popish ritual in Bohemia. In 1623, by an arbitrary exercise of power, he transferred the electoral dignity and the Upper Palatinate to the duke of Bavaria. The seat of what is known in history as the Thirty Years' War was transferred to the north through his attacking the Protestants of the Lower Saxon Circle, whose cause was taken up in 1625 by Christian IV. of Denmark, and the revolt of the north was crushed with the pacification of that war. See Thirty Years' War.

Ferdinand III. Born at Gratz, Styria, July 11 (or 13), 1608; died at Vienna, April 2, 1657. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Ferdinand II. He was made king of Hungary in 1625, king of Bohemia in 1627, king of the Romans in 1636, and emperor in 1637. On the assassination of Wallenstein in 1634, he was invested with the nominal command of the imperial army, the real command being exercised by Pappenheim and took part in the victory over the Swedes at Nordlingen Sept. 6, 1634. He signed the peace of Westphalia Oct. 24, 1648.

Ferdinand I., etc., Kings of Leon. See Ferdinand I., etc., Kings of Castile.

Ferdinand I. Born about 1424; died Jan. 25, 1494. King of Naples, illegitimate son of Alfonso V. of Aragon. Pope Calixtus III. refused to recognize his title to the kingdom, which his father had bequeathed him in 1458; and John of Anjou, thinking to regain the throne of his ancestors attacked and defeated him July 7, 1460. He made his peace with the successors of Calixtus, Pius II., and Paul II., and the duke of Milan's chief Scanderbeg, inflicted a decisive defeat on John of Anjou at Troia Aug. 18, 1462.

Ferdinand II. Born July 26, 1469; died Oct. 7, 1496. King of Naples 1495–96, son of Alfonso II. and grandson of Ferdinand I. His claim established in his favor on the invasion of his dominions by Charles VIII. of France. Naples was occupied by the French, and Ferdinand fled to Ischia, but recovered his throne by the aid of Gonsalvo de Cordova, the great general of Ferdinand V. of Castile.

Ferdinand III., King of Naples. See Ferdinand I., King of the Two Sicilies.

Ferdinand I. Born about 1345; died in 1383. King of Portugal 1367–83. On the death of Pedro in 1369, he claimed the throne of Castile, which was seized by Henry of Trastamara, illegitimate brother of Pedro. He renounced his claim in 1371, after some severe fighting. He was the last of the direct Burgundian line which had reigned in Portugal from about 1112. He was succeeded by his natural brother John, grand master of the order of Avis.

Ferdinand II. Born at Vienna, Oct. 29, 1816; died Dec. 15, 1885. Titular king of Portugal, son of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. He married Maria II. of Portugal in 1836, and was regent 1853–55.

Ferdinand I. (IV. of Naples). Born at Naples, Jan. 12, 1751; died there, Jan. 4, 1825. King of the Two Sicilies, son of Charles III. of Spain. He reigned in Naples 1759–1806 and 1815–25 (the interval being occupied by the French domination), and in Sicily 1759–1825. He consolidated his states as the Two Sicilies in 1816.

Ferdinand II. Born at Palermo, Jan. 10, 1810; died at Naples, May 22, 1859. King of the Two Sicilies 1830–59, son of Francis I. whom he succeeded. His oppressive and despotic reign provoked numerous political disturbances, which culminated in 1848 in a political insurrection in Sicily. This rising was quelled in 1849 by the bombardment of the principal cities, an expedient which acquired for him the epithet of "Bomba." His treatment of political suspects was made the subject of two letters addressed to the Earl of Aberdeen by Mr. Gladstone, who visited Naples in 1850.

Ferdinand III. Born at Florence, May 6, 1769; died at Florence, June 18, 1824. Grand Duke of Tuscany and Archduke of Austria, younger son of the emperor Leopold II., whom he succeeded as grand duke in 1790. He reigned until 1799, and from 1814 to 1824.

Ferdinand IV. Born June 10, 1835. Grand Duke of Tuscany, son of Leopold II. whom he succeeded in 1859. His dominions were incorporated with Sardinia in 1860.

Ferracute (fer'ä-kūt), or Ferragus (fer'a-gus), D. Ferrau (fer-rou'). A giant celebrated in mediæval romance. He appears with various attributes in the story of Valentine and Orson, as Ferracute. He has in his castle the enormous lance from which animals are appetized, but to Duke Huon of Bordeaux he is a Portuguese giant; in others a Spanish knight, in others a Saracen; in all of them a ruffianly and unfashionable but obdurate vanquishes him.

While in Navarre, it is reported to Charlemagne that a syrian giant of fiendish enormity, called Ferragus, the Ferrau of the Italians), has appeared at Nagera. This creature possessed most exuberant proportions; he was twelve cubits high, his face was a cubit in length and his nose was measured palm. As soon as Charles arrived at Nagera, the monarch's gentleman proposed a single combat, but the king was so little tempted by a proposal so unwieldy that he declined his offer. Ogier the Dane was the champion selected as the Christian champion; but the giant, tussing him under one arm, carried him off to the town, and served a succession of knights in a similar manner, disbanded at length went out against him. The Saracen, as usual, commenced the attack by pulling his antagonist from the saddle, and rode off with him, till wearied with all its force, seized him by the chin, and both fell to the ground. When they had demounted, the knight, thinking to kill the pagan only with the hilt of his sword, found him being now on his Orlando-strike a blow on him that knocked the sword from his hand; on which the giant slew his adversaries' horse with a pat of his fist. After this the opponents fought on foot, and the knight stuck to swords exchange, when Ferrau demanded a truce till next day. Bandys, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 278.

Feyjoo y Montenegro (fā-ē-hō' ē mōn-tā-nā'-grō). Frey Benito. Born at Cardamiro, near Orense, Spain, Oct. 8, 1676; died at Oviedo, Spain, Sept. 26, 1764. A noted Spanish critic and scholar, a Benedictine monk. He published the "Teatro critico universal" (1726–60), "Cartas eruditas y curiosas" (1760), etc.

Still, when, in 1726, Feyjoo printed a volume of essays connected with this main purpose, he was able to command public attention, and was encouraged to go on. He called it "The Critical Theatre"; and in its different dissertations—as separate as the papers in "The Spectator," but longer, and on graver subjects—he boldly attacked the dialectics and metaphysics then taught everywhere in Spain; maintained Bacon's system of induction in the physical sciences; upheld the general opinion in relation to comets, eclipses, and the arts of magic and divination; laid down rules for historical faith, which would exclude most of the early traditions of the country; showed a greater deference for woman, and claimed for her a higher place in society, than the influence of the Spanish Church willingly permitted her to occupy; and, in all respects, came forward as an innovator, encouraging generously the advancement of education, the pursuit of truth, and the improvement of social life. Eight volumes of this stirring series were published before 1742, and then it stopped, without any apparent reason. But in 1742 Feyjoo began a similar series of discussions, under the name of "Letters and Inquiring Letters," which he published in 1750, with the fifth volume, thus closing up the long series of his truly philanthropical, as well as philosophical, labors. Ticknor, spun. Lit., III. 372.

Fidessa (fī-des'ä). [='The faithful,' from L. fides, faith.] In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the name and character assumed by the false Duessa (Falsehood) when she joined Cross Knight.

Fiebres (fē-ā'bres). [Sp., 'fevers.'] A nickname given in Guatemala, and to some extent in other Central American countries, to the liberal party. It was in common use from the period of independence until 1850 or later. The liberals were called Fiebres chiefly by their opponents. Opposed to Aristocratas or Serviles. See Serviles.

Field (fēld), Cyrus West. Born at Stockbridge, Mass., Nov. 30, 1819; died at New York, July 12, 1892. The founder of the Atlantic Cable Company, son of David Dudley Field (1781–1867). He established in 1850 a paper-business in New York from the active management of which he retired in 1853 with a fortune. He organized about 1854 the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, which connected the American continent with Newfoundland by a submarine cable in 1856. In 1856 he organized the Atlantic Telegraph Company, which, with the assistance of the English and United States governments, succeeded after two failures in laying a submarine cable between Ireland and Newfoundland. The first public message was sent by Queen Victoria to the President, Aug. 16, 1858; the cable ceased to work Sept. 1 following. The submerging of a new cable was begun in 1865. It broke in 1865, after 1,686 miles of it had been laid, and the whole was lost. In 1866 a new cable was successfully laid, and July 29 of that year the old cable was grappled and hauled in to the United States. The cable lost in 1865 was recovered and completed. Later in life Mr. Field further was concerned in the organization of the Commercial Cable Company and in the submerging of the last two cables.

Field of the Forty Footsteps. See the extract.

The fields behind Montagu House were, from about the year 1680 until towards the end of the last century, the scene of robbery, murder, and every species of depravity. . . . Tradition had given to the superstitious at that period [1800] a legendary story, of the period of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, of two soldiers who fought in this field so desperately as to destroy each other; since which their footsteps formed from the vengeful struggle were said to remain. . . . nor could any agency ever whatever be produced where these "forty footsteps" were thus displayed. That strong dusky mark was said to be at the entire termination of the notorious Field of Upper Montagu Street. They were built over about 1800. Rimbault.

Fields (fēldz), James Thomas. Born at Portsmouth, N. H., Dec. 31, 1817; died at Boston, April 24, 1881. An American publisher and author. He was successively a partner in several book-firms at Boston, and edited the "Atlantic Monthly" 1868–1870. He wrote "Yesterdays with Authors" (1872), and edited, in conjunction with C. D. Whipple, "The Family Library of British Poetry, from Chaucer to the Present Time, 1350–1858" (1879)

Fiennes (fē-enz'), James, Baron Saye and Sele. Died July 4, 1450. An English nobleman. He was the second son of Sir William de Fiennes, killed in the French wars; was made constable of Dover and warden of the Cinque Ports in 1447, was created a baron, with the title of Lord Saye and Sele, in 1447, was also appointed constable of the Tower of London, and was made lord treasurer in 1449. He was one of a party of youths who engaged in a poaching frolic in the park of Mr. Nicholas Pelham at Laughton, April 30, 1541; and one of the party keeper was mortally wounded in a scuffle. The whole poaching party was apparently under pressure from the king, prosecuted for murder, and Lord Dacre and three of his companions were condemned to death.

Fierabras (fē-ā-brä'). [From L. ferax, iron, as in the name Brassde-Fer; in English, Sir Ferumbras.] One of the paladins of Charlemagne. He gave his name to the most popular of the French chanson de gestes. It remains in a Provençal version and a French version, in two MSS. of the 13th century and two of the 14th. A prose version of it was printed at Geneva in 1478, and Caxton's "Lyf of the Noble and Crysten Prynce Charlemayne" was printed in 1485. It was a translation from that French prose version of Fierabras. M. Gaston Paris has pointed out that Fierabras is an expansion of an earlier poem, "Balan," with the several action changed, separated, and with improvements in the story. The poem of "Balan" appears in English as the romance of "The Sowdon of Babylon." "Sir Ferumbras" is a translation from the latter "Fierabras," the work of an ecclesiastic of Exeter, after 1377 (Morley, Eng. Writers, VI. 65)

Fierabras. An opera by Franz Schubert, composed in 1823, but never produced. It is said to contain his best work.

Fiesole (fē-ā'sō-le). A small town in the province of Florence, Italy, 4 miles northeast of Florence; the ancient Faesulæ. It has a flourishing industries. An old Etruscan city, it contains Etruscan and Roman antiquities. It was the headquarters of Catiline in 62 B. C., and was the scene of the victory of Stilicho over the Teutonic invaders under Radagaisus in about 406. La Badia, a monastery designed by Brunelleschi, published in 1462, is one of the most beautiful monastic foundations of the Renaissance. There are two convents and cloisters each in two wooded tiers. The church is in large part the original Romanesque structure, with a dome at the crossing, needless, ugly, and delicate sculpture and panelled incrustation. The Roman theater is in excellent preservation. The semicircular cavea lies over 20 tiers of seats in position, part rock-hewn, with several radial stairways, vaulted substructions, and fine entrance arches at the wings. The diameter is 220 feet, that of the orchestra 64. The orchestra was founded in 1028, and altered in the 13th century. There are 3 aisles divided by 11 antique columns of different sizes and orders, and a transept with domed crossing. Structure and ornament are closely similar to those of San Miniato, Florence. The Salutati Chapel contains a beautiful relief and a bust by Mino da Fiesole (1466).

Fiesole, Giovanni Angelico da, generally called Fra Angelico real name Guido, or Guidolino, da Pietro, called Giovanni on following orders). Born at Vecchio, in the province of Mugello, Italy, 1387; died near Rome, March 18 (?), 1455. A celebrated Italian painter of religious subjects. He came to have been early impressed by the Miniaturists. In 1417 he entered, with his brother Benedetto, a painter, the Dominican convent in Fiesole. From 1409 to 1418 he lived at Foligno and Cortona; from 1418 to 1436 at Fiesole; from 1436 to 1445 at Florence in the convent of San Marco; and from 1445 to 1455 at Rome. His most important works are the frescos at Orvieto (1447), and the decoration of the Chapel of the Sainte-Sacrement in the Vatican. The Florentine period was most productive of easel-pictures, which include the "Coronation of the Virgin" now in the Louvre, the same subject (a favorite one) now in the Uffizi, a "Last Judgment," etc. He is especially celebrated for the spirituality and mystical charm of his saints and angels. The story of San Marco, now the Museo di San Marco, was decorated by Fra Angelico and his pupils, and some of his best frescos are there.

This kingdom was to be the fifth and last in the series of which those of Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome were the preceding four; hence their self-assumed title. They unsuccessfully attempted risings against the government in 1657 and 1661.

Figaro (fē-gä-rō'). A character introduced by Beaumarchais in his plays "Le barbier de Seville" and "La mariage de Figaro," and "La mere coupable"; used later by Mozart, Rossini, and Rossini in operas. In the "Barbier" he is a barber: in the "Mariage" he is a valet. In both he is gay, lively, and conspicuous; his stratagems are always original, his wit keen, and his character individual. He is a type of intrigue, adroitness, and versatility. In the "Mere coupable" he has become virtuous and has lost his verve. See also Beaumarchais's "Fables of a Day, taken from Beaumarchais's 'Mariage de Figaro.'" Finns (finz). [Also Fins; ME. Fennes, AS. Fenas, Icel. Finnir, Sw. Dan. Finner, ML. Fenni, perhaps identical with L. Finni, Gr. Φῖνοι, the name of an obscure northern tribe mentioned by Tacitus and Ptolemy.] The native race of Finland; also, the Finnic race, specifically, that branch of the Finnic race which inhabits Finland and other parts of northwestern Russia. They call themselves Suomi or Suomalaiset.

The Finnish branch of the Mongolian race to which the Laps, Fins, Ehsts, and Livonians belong possessed pastoral habits in the region just south of Northern Europe, and was driven out more and more by the immigrations of Germanic tribes, or became mixed with them. Tacitus already mentions the Fins in his Germania, but he could only vaguely describe a region about them—terra feritas. The nation of the Fins is the principal stem of this branch.

Le Sauvage, science of Religion, p. 302.

Finsbury (finz'ber-i). A district of London lying north of the Thames. As a parliamentary borough it is bounded by St. Pancras on the west, Islington on the north, Shoreditch on the east, and the City and Strand on the south, and consists of three distinct constituencies—Central, Holborn, and East. The district was once the great prebendal manor of Holywell, and was leased by its incumbent in 1315 to the mayor and commonalty of the city for an annual rent of 20 shillings: this lease ran out in 1867. Loftie.

In 1498 all the gardens which had continued time out of mind without Moorgate—to wit, about and beyond the bulwarke or Finsbury, were destroyed, and of them was made a plaine field, which is now called Finsbury field, in which there was then set up the artillarie, and here they usually shot at butts and roges. Stow, Surv., p. 9243. In Queen's time this was the usual haunt of the playing citizens. Peoples' fashions, or who aspired to be thought so, probably mixed but little in those pastimes; and hence we may account for the indignation of Master Stephen at being suspected of such vulgarity. Another of a similar kind occurs in Shakspeare: "As if they never walk'd any further than Finsbury." Beaum. and Fl., Knight of the Burning Pestle, Induction. Ben Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, p. 4.

He became deputy of Calais in 1540; stormed Boulogne Sept. 14, 1544; became lord chamberlain in 1545; on the fall of Somerset, in 1549, was appointed one of the guardians of King Edward VI.; and filled important offices (though several times in disgrace) under Elizabeth, to whose hand he at one time aspired.

Fitzalan, Richard. Born 1307 (?); died 1376. An English soldier and statesman, Earl of Arundel and Warenne. He played a conspicuous part in the wars of Edward III. and in the politics of that reign. At Crécy he commanded the second division of the English army.

Fitzalan, Richard. Born 1346; died 1397. An English naval and military commander, Earl of Arundel and Surrey. On March 24, 1387, he, with Nottingham, defeated a Spanish, Flemish, and French fleet off Margate, and captured nearly 100 vessels laden with wine. He was one of the most prominent of the enemies of Richard II., and conspired against him. He was arrested by the king, was convicted of treason, and was decapitated on Tower Hill. He was revered by the people as a martyr.

Fitzalan, Thomas. Born 1381; died Oct. 13, 1415. An English soldier and statesman, Earl of Arundel and Surrey. He was conspicuous as a supporter of the throne in the wars and the politics of the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V.

Fitzdottrel (fits-dot'rel). In Ben Jonson's "The Devil is an Ass," a simple but conceited Norfolk squire. He develops into an impostor. The name alludes to the foolishness of the dotterel.

Fitzdottrel is one of these characters which Jonson delighted to draw, and in which he stood unrivalled; a gull, i. e., a credulous coxcomb, selfish, cunning, and conceited.

Gifford, Notes to "The Devil is an Ass."

Fitzgerald (fits-jer'ald), Lord Edward. Born at Carton Castle, near Dublin, Oct. 15, 1763; died in prison at Dublin, June 4, 1798. An Irish politician and revolutionist, fifth son of the first Duke of Leinster. He served in the army in Ireland and in 1781 in America, and was wounded at the battle of Eutaw Springs. Later he served in New Brunswick; went to Detroit, where he was admitted into the Iroquois confederacy; visited the Mississippi to New Orleans. He returned to England; was removed from the army for attending a revolutionary banquet; and joined the United Irishmen, in which treasonable conspiracy he took a leading part. He was arrested, and died from a wound inflicted by one of his captors.

Fitzgerald, Lady Edward. Born at Fogo Island, Newfoundland, about 1776; died at Paris, Nov., 1851. The wife of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, whom she married in 1792. Though according to general repute, she was the daughter of Madame de Genlis and the Duke of Orleans (Philippe "Egalité"), it appears that her parents' name was Sims, and that she was not the child of the Duke, but was married to the children of the duke. She was married under the name of Anne Stephanie Caroline Sims, but is best known by her pet name "Pamela."

Fitzgerald, Edward. Born at Bredfield House, near Woodbridge, Suffolk, March 31, 1809; died at Merton, Norfolk, June 14, 1883. An English poet and translator. He published "Euphranor: a Dialogue on Youth" (1851), "Polonius: a Collection of Wise Sayings and Modern Instances" (1852), translation of six dramas of Calderon (1853), a translation of the "Quatrains" of Omar Khayyam (1859; his most celebrated work), and other translations.

Fitzjames (fits-jāmz'), James, Duke of Berwick. Born at Moulins, France, Aug. 21, 1670; died at Philipsburg, June 12, 1734. A noted soldier, illegitimate son of James, duke of York (James II., England), and Arabella Churchill, sister of the Duke of Marlborough. He was educated in France. In 1687 he was created duke of Berwick; later served under the Duke of Lorraine in Hungary; was made governor of Portsmouth, England, in 1688; with his father went to France. He promoted the attempt to replace James on the throne by a descent on Ireland; was present at the battle of the Boyne; and became commander-in-chief of the king's forces in Ireland. In 1691 he joined the French army, in which he rose to the rank of marshal, becoming a French subject in order to secure this promotion. He fought in Flanders, under Boufflers, in 1702; commanded the French army in Spain in 1704; captured Nice in 1706; and defeated the allied English and Portuguese at Almanza in 1707. He was killed at the siege of Philipsburg.

Fitzgebon (fits-gē'bn), William, Died 1071. A Norman noble, a friend and prominent supporter of William the Conqueror, created by him earl of Hereford. He was one of the chief promoters of the Conquest, fought at the battle of Hastings, and acted as viceroy during the absence of William. He was killed in Wales, and died in 1071.

He became a member of Parliament in 1774; served in the war of the American Revolution 1777–78; became chief secretary for Ireland in 1782; and was appointed secretary at war 1783. He was one of the leaders of the Whig Club.

Fitzroy (fits-roi'), Augustus Henry, third Duke of Grafton. Born Oct. 1, 1735; died at Euston Hall, Suffolk, March 14, 1811. An English statesman. He was secretary of state for the northern department, July, 1765; May, 1766; and became first lord of the treasury Dec. 30, 1766; resigned Jan. 28, 1768. As a result of Pitt's illness, Grafton was the head of the ministry after Sept., 1767. He resigned in Jan., 1775.

Fitzroy, Henry, first Duke of Grafton. Born Sept., 1663; died Oct. 9, 1690. An illegitimate son of Charles II. of England, by Barbara Villiers, countess of Castlemain. He obtained considerable distinction as a soldier, and was mortally wounded in the attack on Cork under Marlborough.

Fitzroy, Robert. Born at Ampton Hall, Suffolk, July 5, 1805; died at London, April 30, 1865. A British naval officer. From 1828 to 1830, and again from 1831 to 1836, he commanded the Beagle in extended surveys of the South American coast and in the circumnavigation of the globe. During the second voyage Charles Robert Darwin accompanied him as naturalist. The Geographical Society awarded its gold medal to Fitzroy in 1837. In 1839 he published "Narrative of the Surveying Voyages of H. M. ships Adventure and Beagle," in 3 vols. (the third by Darwin). He was governor of New Zealand 1843–45 and superintendent of the Woolwich dockyard 1846–49, and held other important posts. Several well-known works on navigation and meteorology were published by him, and he is regarded as the founder of the modern meteorological service. Pressure of work connected with his duties as chief of the meteorological service of the Board of Trade caused his mind to give way, and he committed suicide.

Fitzstephen (fits-stē'ven), William. Died about 1190. A clerk, friend, and biographer of Thomas Becket. His "Vita Sancti Thomæ" was first printed in 1723 (in Sparkes's "Historiæ Anglicanæ Scriptores").

Flagellants (flaj'e-lants). [From L. flagellant-tes, ppr. of flagellare, whip, scourge.] A body of religious persons who believed that by whipping and scourging the themselves to rigorous discipline they could appease the divine wrath against their sins and the sins of the age. Associations of flagellants founded about 1260 spread through out Europe. In many cases they degenerated into bands scourging their own bare bodies till the blood ran. It was by the practices gained in the course of disorders they were suppressed, but the sect was never stamped out on a large scale in Italy and several subsequent years, in connection with the dreadful plague called the "Black death." The dregs of Italy and Germany in the 15th century caught the sect mania, and promulgated similar horrors. They have been described as the last flagellants authorized by the Roman Catholic Church. Some flagellant sects held doctrines opposed to the Roman Catholic church, and appeared among those of Protestantism.

Flagellum Dei (flaj'e-lum dē'i). [L., 'scourge of God.'] A surname of Attila. See the extract.

Thistitle, "Flagellum Dei" comes with most worrisome frequency in the medieval references to Attila and to no sooner we meet with it, we hear, as a rule, that we are at the ground of contemporaneous and authentic history, and have entered the cloud land of oral and unauthenticated gossip. Later and more learned writers have attributed to him the title of "standard of Nimrod, nurtured in Egypt by the genius of God, kings of Huns, Goths, Danes, and Medes, destined to rule the world, and to have been a tendency, as Mr. Herbert thinks, to identify him with the Anti-Christ of the scriptures, but this is not proved, and is scouted by ancient writers. All the medieval idea of Anti-Christ, who is generally placed in the future or in the present rather than in the past.

Flaminian Way (flă-min'i-an wā), or Via Flaminia (vī'ă flă-min'i-ă). One of the oldest and most famous highways of ancient Rome. It extended in a direct line from Rome to Ariminum (Rimini), and was built by the censor Caius Flaminius (220 B. C.). Its superintendence was held to be so honorable an office that Augustus himself assumed it in 27 B. C., as did his Cæsar had been curator of the Appian Way. Augustus restored it through its entire extent, in commemoration of which triumphal arches were erected to him over the road at Ariminum and at Rome, the arch at the former place still exists. Much of the old pavement survives, together with many tombs by the roadside.

Flaminius (flă-mi-ni'us), Titus Quintius. Born about 230 B. C.; died about 174 B. C. A Roman general and statesman. He was consul in 198, defeated Philip V. of Macedon at Cynoscephalæ in 197, and proclaimed at the Isthmian festival of 196 that Greece should be free. He was totally defeated by Hannibal at Lake Trasimene in 217, and fell in the battle.

The insurgents marched on London, but were defeated at Blackheath June 22, 1497. Their leaders, including Flammock, were executed June 28.

Flamsteed (flam'stēd), John. Born at Denby, near Derby, England, Aug. 19, 1646: died at Greenwich, Dec. 31, 1719. A famous English astronomer, appointed the first astronomer royal March 4, 1675. He is especially noted for the importance of his observations, many of which were turned to account by Newton. He became a bitter enemy of Newton.

Flamsteed's "British Catalogue" is styled by Baily "one of the proudest productions of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich." Its importance is due to its being the first collection of the kind made with the telescope and the clock. Its value was necessarily impaired by defective reduction, and Flamsteed's neglect of Newton's advice to note the state of the barometer and thermometer at the time of his observations rendered it hopeless to attempt to reduce from them the improved results by modern processes of correction. The catalogue showed besides defects attributable to the absence of the author's final revision. Sir Wilfrid Lawson detected errors to the numerous as to suggest the need of an index to the original observations printed in the second volume of the "Historia Coelestis." Miss Herschel undertook the task, and showed, by recomputing the place of each star, that Flamsteed had catalogued 111 stars which he had never observed, and observed 564 which he had not catalogued ("Phil. Trans.," LXXVIII, 253). He rearranged Flamsteed's edited stars was published by order of the Royal society in 1798; they were by Baily in 1835 arranged in order of right ascension, and identified (all but seventy) by comparison with later catalogues ("Memoirs Royal Astr. Soc.," IV, 129).

Flateyjarbok (flät'ey-yar-bok). [ON., 'book of Flatey.'] An Icelandic manuscript, named from the island Flatey off the northern coast of Iceland, where it was owned in the 17th century. It contains a collection of sagas bearing upon the lives and times of the Norwegian kings Olaf Tryggvason and Olaf the Saint: at the end are annals down to the year 1394. It is now in Copenhagen.

Flathead (flat'hed) Lake, or Selish (sē'lish) Lake. A lake in Missoula County, Montana, about lat. 48° N., long. 114° 15′ W., its outlet falls into Clarke's River. Length, about 30 miles.

Flatheads. See Chocktaws and Salishan.

Flattery (flat'ėr-i), Cape. A cape in the northwestern part of Washington, projecting into the Pacific Ocean in lat. 48° 23′ 20″ N., long. 124° 44′ 30″ W. (lighthouse).

Flaubert (flō-bār'), Gustave. Born at Rouen, Dec. 12, 1821: died at Croisset, near Rouen, May 8, 1880. A French writer and novelist. He is regarded as the master of naturalism. He traveled in Brittany, Germany, Egypt, etc., and undertook to relate his travels, but went no further than an opening paper entitled "A bord de la Cange." In 1857 he published his novel "Madame Bovary," and in "L'Artiste" "Le Château de Saint Antoine." The former gave rise to considerable litigation, Flaubert being ultimately cleared of a charge of immorality in literature. In 1858 he published "Salammbo." Flaubert's plays, and in 1862 published "Salammbo." This was followed in 1869 by "L'Education sentimentale, roman d'un jeune homme," and in 1877 by "Trois contes." Flaubert's plays, "Candidat" and "Le château des fleurs," were failures: they were published after his death in "La Vie Moderne" (1880). His other posthumous publications are "Bouvard et Pecuchet" (in "La Revue Politique et Littéraire"), "Lettres a George Sand" (1884), "Parles champs et par les grèves," reminiscences of Brittany in "Le Gaulois," an essay on Rabelais, a voluminous correspondence, etc.

Flaxman

Flauto Magico, Il. See Zauberflöte.

Flavel (flav'el), John. Born at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, England, about 1630; died at Exeter, June 26, 1691. An English Presbyterian clergyman and devotional writer. His best-known work is "Husbandry Spiritualized" (1669).

Flavian (flā'vi-an), L. Flavianus (flā-vi-ā'nus), of Antioch. 1. Died 404 A.D. Bishop of Antioch 381–404. He was appointed by the synod of Constantinople which was composed exclusively of Oriental bishops, to succeed Meletius. This action perpetuated the schism which at the time divided the orthodox church at Antioch, as the bishops of Egypt and the West refused to withdraw their support from Paulinus, bishop of the opposite faction.

2. Died at Petra, Arabia, 518. Bishop of Antioch 498–512. He was deposed by the emperor Anastasius through the machinations of the Monophysite Xenias, bishop of Hierapolis, who intimidated him into sanctioning the decrees of the orthodox council held at Chalcedon in 451.

Flavian of Constantinople. Died at Hypepe, Lydia, Aug. 11, 449. Bishop of Constantinople from about 447 to 449. He procured the excommunication of the heretic Eutyches at a synod held at Constantinople in 448, but was himself deposed and excommunicated by the Eutychian party at the synod known as the Robber Synod, held at Ephesus in 449. He died a few days after, in consequence, it is said, of bodily injuries sustained at the synod. He was canonized by the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Flavian Emperors, or Flavian Cæsars. The Roman emperors Vespasian and his sons Titus and Domitian, who belonged to the house of Flavius.

The Flavian Emperors ought, perhaps, hardly to be classed together, so little was there in common between the just, if somewhat hard, rule of Vespasian, or the two years' beneficent sway of Titus, "the delight of the human race," and the detestable tyranny of Domitian. But the stupendous Colosseum, the Arch of Titus, and the Amphitheatre of Vernon serve as unarchitectural landmark to fix the Flavian period. The Flavian period and one other characteristic was necessarily shared by the whole family, the humble origin from which they sprang. After the high-born Julii and Claudii, the descendants of pontiffs and censors, noblemen delicate and fastidious through all their wild debauch of blood, came these sturdy sons of the common-city to robe themselves in the imperial purple; and this unforgotten source of their ancestry, while it gave a touch of meanness to the close and frugal severity most of Vespasian, evidently intensified the delight of Domitian in setting his plebeian feet on the necks of all that was left of refined or aristocratic in Rome.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 6.

All the more strange does it seem, when we consider the humble extraction of the Flavian emperors, that their name should have remained for centuries the favorite title of Emperors no way allied to them in blood, a Claudius Gothicus, a Constantine, a Theodosius, and many more having prefixed the once ignoble name of Flavius to their own. And hence, by a natural process of imitation, the barbarian nobles who settled themselves within the limits of the Roman Empire in the 5th and 6th centuries, Ostrogothian, Lombard, Visigoth, adopted the same mysteriously majestic three-name, unconsciously, as we must suppose, selecting the very epithet which best described their own personal appearance, yellow-haired sons of the north, as they were, among the dark-colored Mediterranean populations.

Freeman, Historical Essays, 2nd ser. Invaders, I. 7.

Flavigny (flä-vēn-yē'), Valérien. Born near Laon, France: died at Paris, April 22, 1894. A noted French Orientalist, professor of Hebrew in the College of France.

Flavius (flā'vi-us). 1. In Shakspere's "Julius Cæsar," a Roman tribune.—2. In Shakspere's "Timon of Athens," the faithful steward of Timon.

Flavius, Cneius. An early writer on Roman law. He was the son of a freedman, and became secretary to Appius Claudius Cæcus. He obtained possession of the forms and technicalities pertaining to the law of practice, the knowledge of which was confined to the patricians and pontiffs, and published them in a collection known as the "Jus Flavianum." He was afterward made a senator by Appius Claudius, and was elected curule ædile in 303 B. C. Also called Cneius and Gnæus.

Flaw (flâ). In Foote's comedy "The Cozeners," one of the cozeners or cheats.

Flaxman (flaks'man), John. Born at York, England, July 6, 1755; died at London, Dec. 7, 1826. A famous sculptor and draftsman. His father was a modeler, and kept a shop in Covent Garden for the sale of plaster images. By his own efforts he learned enough Greek and Latin to read the poets. At fifteen he entered the Royal Academy. In 1770 he exhibited a figure of Neptune in wax. In Aug., 1787, he went to Italy for seven years. During this period were made the illustrations of the Odyssey and to Dante's Inferno and Purgatorio. He was elected associate of the Royal Academy in 1797, and full member in 1800. From this time until the end of his life he executed many works, among which one of the most celebrated is the Shield of Achilles from the description of Homer. He was appointed professor of sculpture at the Royal Academy in 1810.

Nature, so prodigal to the English race in men of genius untutored, singular, and solitary, has given us but few seers who, in the quality of prolific invention, can be compared with Flaxman. For pure conceptive faculty, controlled by unerring sense of beauty, we have to think of Pheidias or Raphael before we find his equal.

Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 177.

Fleance (flē'ans). In Shakspere's "Macbeth," the son of Banquo. See Banquo.

Flèche (flāsh). La. A town in the department of Sarthe, France, on the Loir 29 miles northwest of Angers. It has a noted military college. Population (1891), commune, 10,249.

Fléchier (flā-shyā'). Esprit. Born at Pernes, Vaucluse, France, June 10, 1632; died at Montpellier, France, Feb. 16, 1710. A French pulpit orator, made bishop of Nimes in 1687. He is noted especially for his funeral orations. His complete works were published in 1782.

Flecknoe (flek'nō), Richard. Born apparently in Ireland; died about 1678. A British poet and playwright of slight merit. He furnished Dryden with the name "MacFlecknoe," under which he satirized Shadwell.

Fleece'em (flēs'm), Mrs. In Foote's play "The Cozeners," a cheat and confederate of Flaw.

Mrs. Grieve, the woman who had extorted money on pledge of procuring government appointments, and who had not only deceived Charles Fox, by pretending to be able to supply him to a heiress, but had herself given money rather than miss his chariot from her door, was fair game, and was well exposed, in Mrs. Fleecem.

Boaden, Eng. Stage, II. 126.

Flee from the Press, A short poem by Chaucer, printed before the folio of 1532. It is sometimes known as "Lenvoy de Chaucer to his Scogan," "Good Counsel of Chaucer" (Shirley), and "Balade that Chaucier made on his Deth-bedde" ("probably a more bad guess," Skeat).

Fleet Prison, The. An old London prison, formerly standing on the east side of the Fleet brook, where it now runs under Farringdon street. It was nearly eight hundred years old when it was destroyed in 1846. It was called the "ward of the Fleet" in the time of Edward I., and was also known as such as early as 1290. It was used also as a state prison for religious and political offenders until 1641, when it was reserved entirely for debtors. It was burned by Wat Tyler's men in 1381. In 1666 it was burned in the Great Fire, and again in 1780 by rioters. In the 17th and early part of the 18th century persons wishing to be married secretly came within the rules of the Fleet, where degraded clergymen were easily found, among the debtors, to perform the ceremony. This was stopped by act of Parliament in 1754. Another, and the outrageous treatment of the prisoners in 1726, when the warden was tried for murder.

Fleet street, A London street running from Ludgate Circus to the Strand and the West End. It is named from the Fleet brook. In the early chronicles of London many allusions are made to the deeds of violence done in this street. The London precinces voyced on the expulsion of the Templars in the time of Court, etc. By the time of Elizabeth the street had become a favorite spot for shows of all descriptions: "puppet-shows and monsters" are frequently alluded to. It is now one of the busiest streets of London.

Fleet, The. [Early mod. E. and ME. Flete, the stream.] A tidal stream which flowed by the western wall of old London City. The creek took its rise in the clay beds east of the Hampstead Hills. At Battle Bridge, now King's Cross, it ran in a deep valley between high clay banks, from which it did not emerge until it reached the river. In Roman times the only road from the city westward ran over it by a bridge from Snow Hill, Newgate, to Holborn Hill (High Holborn). Later another was made opposite Ludgate, and this crossing was called Fleet Bridge. The road which led to it was called Fleet street (which see). The importance of the Fleet was considerable in the reign of Edward I. The brook is now a main sewer of London, and empties into the Thames at Blackfriars Bridge. The channel of the Fleet-ditch in the literature of the 16th and 17th centuries is accounted for by the fact that the water from the bed of the brook or river having become diverted from its course, the offal, etc., thrown into it was not carried off, and became a nuisance.

Fleetwood (flēt'wūd). A seaport and watering-place in Lancashire, England, situated on Morecambe Bay 36 miles due north of Liverpool. Population (1891), 9,274.

Fleetwood, Charles. Died 1692. An English Parliamentary general, lord deputy of Ireland 1654–57. He married Bridget Ireton, daughter of Oliver Cromwell and widow of Henry Ireton, in 1652.

Fleetwood, William. Born at London, Jan. 21, 1656; died at Tottenham, near London, Aug. 4, 1723. An English bishop of St. Asaph 1708, and of Ely 1714; and pulpit orator.

Flegel (flā'gel), Robert. Born at Wilna, Germany, Oct., 1855; died at Brass, West Africa, Sept. 11, 1886. An African explorer. In 1875 he went to Lagos as clerk in a German trading factory. When an English expedition went up the Niger and Binue rivers, he accompanied it in the Henry Venn, and took a survey of both rivers. The German-African Association commissioned him to explore Sokoto and Nupe in 1880. He proceeded overland to Lokoja, on the Binue, reached Yola, the capital of Adamawa, in 1882; and discovered the Nguandere source of the Binue. In 1883 he revisited Adamawa, but failed in his attempt to reach the Kongo by that route. On his return to Germany in 1884, he urged the occupation of the Binue basin by German commerce and authority. With imperial support he undertook a third expedition to Adamawa, but the Royal Niger Company frustrated his efforts. He was recalled, and died at Brass, in 1886.

Flégère (flā-jâr'). A height in the Alps of Mont Blanc, northeast of Chamonix, celebrated for its view. Height, 5,925 feet.

Fleischer (flī'sher), Heinrich Leberecht. Born at Schandau, Saxony, Feb. 21, 1801; died at Leipsic, Feb. 10, 1888. A noted German Orientalist, professor of Oriental languages at Leipsic from 1835. He published editions of Abulfedas "Historia ante-islamica" (1831), Baidhawis commentary on the Koran (1844–48), "Grammatica et lexicon persico-turcicæ" (compiled on the grammar of Mohammed Ibrahim; 2d ed., 1876), etc.

Fleming (flem'ing), John. Born near Bathgate, Jan. 10, 1785; died at Edinburgh, Nov. 18, 1857. A Scottish clergyman and naturalist. He was professor of natural philosophy in Aberdeen University, 1823–45, and of natural history in the Edinburgh College. Edinburgh, from 1845. He wrote "Philosophy of Zoology" (1822), "The Temperature of the Seasons" (1851), and many scientific papers.

Fleming, Lady May. In Sir Walter Scott's novel "The Abbot," a maid of honor to Mary Queen of Scotland, imprisoned with her at Lochleven.

Fleming, Margaret. Born Jan. 15, 1803; died Dec. 19, 1811. The daughter of James Fleming of Kirkcaldy, Scotland. She was the pet of Sir Walter Scott, who has made a remarkable record of her child life in "Lockhart's Scott," ch. xxiii. Her diary and poems are exceedingly quaint. Her life was written by Dr. John Brown: "Rab and his Friends: Marjorie Fleming."

Fleming, Paul. Born at Hartenstein, Saxony, Oct. 5, 1609; died at Hamburg, April 2, 1640. A German poet. He studied medicine at Leipsic. The Thirty Years War drove him to Holstein, where he soon joined an embassy of the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein to Moscow, and afterward (1636) another to Ispahan. He was above all a lyric poet, and wrote both in German and in Latin. Among his poems is the well-known hymn "In allen meinen Thaten." His collected works, which include secular and religious in character, were published after his death under the title "Teutsche Poemata" (1646).

Fleming, Paul. The principal character in Longfellow's prose romance "Hyperion."

Flemings, Richard. Born at Crofton, Yorkshire; died at Sleaford, Jan., 1431. An English prelate. He was bishop of Lincoln 1419, and founder of Lincoln College, Oxford, 1427.

Fleming, Rose. In Dickens's "Oliver Twist," a gentle girl who marries Harry Maylie.

Flemings (flem'ings). The natives of Flanders, an ancient countship now divided between Belgium, Holland, and France. The Flemings specifically the members of the Flemish race, nearly allied to the Dutch both in blood and in language.

Flemish (flem'ish). The language spoken by the Flemings. The Flemish language is a form of that Low German of which the Dutch is a type. The chief external difference between Dutch and Flemish is in the spelling: the spelling of Dutch having been reformed and simplified in the present century, while Flemish retains in great part the archaic texture of Dutch orthography.

Flensburg (flens'bōrg), Dan. Flensborg (flens'-bōrg). A seaport and commercial town in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, on the Flensburg Fjord, situated in lat. 54° 47′ N., long. 9° 26′ E. Population (1890), 36,444.

Flers (flār). A town in the department of Orne, France, situated in lat. 48° 44′ N., long. 0° 35′ W. It has cotton manufactures. Population (1891), commune, 7,851.

Fleshly School, The. A name given to a number of English poets — Swinburne, Morris, Rossetti, and others — by R. W. Buchanan in the "Contemporary Review."

Flestrin (fles'trin). Quinbus. The Man-Mountain: the name which the Lilliputians gave to Gulliver.

Fleta (flē'tā). An anonymous Latin book on English law, written about 1290. From a statement in the ancient manuscript, that "this book may well be called Fleta because it is written in Fleta," it is inferred that it was written by a prisoner in the Fleet.

Fletcher (flech'er), Andrew, of Saltoun. [The surname Fletcher means "arrow-maker."] Born at Saltoun, Haddingtonshire, 1655; died at London, Sept., 1716. A Scottish politician and political writer. He was a prominent member of the Scottish Parliament under Charles II. and William III.

Fletcher, Giles. Born at Watford, Hertfordshire, about 1549; died at London, March 11, 1611. An English civilian and poet, father of Giles (the younger) and Phineas Fletcher. He was graduated at King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1568. In 1588 he was sent as ambassador to Russia, and published an account of that country in 1591, which was suppressed. It was entitled "of the Russe Common Wealth etc." It was subdued and passages were suppressed by Hakluyt and Purchas, and reprinted as "The History of Russia, etc." (1643), and also, with the original title, for the Hakluyt Society (1856). He also wrote "Licia: Poems of Love, etc." (1593), etc.

Fletcher, Giles (the younger). Born 1588 (?); died 1623. An English poet, younger son of Giles Fletcher. He wrote "Christs Victorie, etc." (1610), etc.

Fletcher, James Cooley. Born at Indianapolis, 1823. An American missionary and author. From 1851 to 1865 he made several extended journeys in Brazil as a missionary, and has published an account of the United States being almost Roman Rio Brazil and the Brazilians" as the result of these journeys. Some of D. P. Kidder and J. C. Fletcher's writings appeared in the "Sketches and Travels of the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder" (1845). He was a contributor to Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography, and published in 1869–75, and subsequently revised by N. Sapho. Since 1877 he has resided at Indianapolis.

Fletcher, John. Born at Rye, Sussex, England, Dec., 1579; died at London, Aug., 1625. An English dramatist and poet. He was the intimate friend and literary partner of Francis Beaumont. They wrote together from about 1606 till 1616, living together for a part of that time.

The stage tradition that Beaumont was superior in judgment to Fletcher is supported by sound criticism. In the most important plays that they wrote together the characters are outweighs Fletcher, both in quantity and in quality. Beaumont had the more profound and subtler mind; Fletcher was more superficial. Fletcher was a facile writer in verse. Fletcher could be a master of brilliant dialogue and sparkling repartee. In the management of his plots and in the development of his characters he was careless and inconsistent. But in his comedies the unreasoning liveliness and humble attitude to sensational effects are generally less apparent, and he is splendid in his dramatic episodes to the abasement of taste and virtues. A. H. Bullen.

To Fletcher alone may be assigned the plays "The Faithful Shepherdess" (printed about 1609), "Wit Without Money" (played before 1614, printed 1639), "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife" (printed 1624), "Women Pleased" (printed 1647), "The Love Pilgrim" (licensed 1625, printed 1647), "The Mad Lover" (played before 1618, printed 1647), "The Humorous Lieutenant" (produced probably in 1619, printed 1647), "Women Pleased" (probably played about 1620, printed 1647), "The Island Princess" and "The Pilgrim" (presented at court 1621, printed 1647), "The Wild-Goose Chase" (produced probably in 1621, printed 1652), "Sea Voyage" (printed 1647), "The Woman's Prize" (played before 1633), "A Wife for a Month" (played before 1624, printed 1647), "Rule a Wife and Have a Wife" (played in 1624, printed 1640), "The Chances" (played before 1625, printed 1647). To Beaumont and Fletcher "The Woman Hater" (licensed 1606, printed 1607), "Thierry and Theodoret" (written probably 1608, based upon a play somewhat earlier in date), "Cupid's Revenge," "The Queen of Corinth" (played before 1619, printed 1647, Middleton and Rowley appear to have written some of it), "Sir John Van Olden Barnavelt" (played 1619, printed in Bullen in his "Collection of Old English Plays" in 1882), "The Little French Lawyer" (written about 1619, printed 1647), "A Very Woman" (licensed 1621, printed 1647), "Monsieur Thomas," "The Custom of the Country" (mentioned in 1628 as an old play, printed 1647), "The Double Marriage," and "The False One" (acted 1619, printed 1647), "Beggars' Bush" (played 1622, printed 1647), "The Prophetess" and "The Sea Voyage" (licensed 1622, printed 1647), "The Elder Brother" (printed 1637), "The Lovers Progress" (printed 1647), "The Spanish Curate" (licensed 1622, printed 1647), "Love's Pilgrimage" (printed 1647: probably nearly all by Fletcher), "The Nice Valour, or The Passionate Madman" (perhaps written in part by Shirley), "The Lady Errant" (Bullen thinks Middleton rewrote much of it), "The Lawes of Candy" (printed 1647: largely by Massinger), "The Fair Maid of the Inn" (licensed 1626, printed 1647, with Rowley), "The Noble Kinsmen" (printed 1634 as by Fletcher and Shakspere), Doubtful plays, "The Captain" (written before 1613, printed 1647: Fletcher had a collaborator, perhaps Jonson or Middleton), "What a Cruel Wedding" (played about 1614, printed 1647: shows traces of Middleton and Rowley), "The Bloody Brother" (printed probably 1639: perhaps written by Fletcher and Jonson, Chapman, and Massinger), "Love's Cure" (written probably about 1625, printed 1647: probably by Massinger and Middleton (Bullen)), "Beaumont and Fletcher's Scattered Masterpieces" (Revised), "The Maid in the Mill" (played in 1623, with Rowley), "The Night Walker, or The Little Thief" (played 1633, printed in 1640 as by Fletcher and Shirley), "The Coronation" (printed in 1640 as by Fletcher, Beaumont, and Shirley: altered in 1663 by Fletcher, Beaumont, and Nevill), "The Knight of Malta" (printed 1647: Fletcher is thought to have had a hand in it, as in "The Faithful Friends"), "The Widow" (written about 1616, printed 1652: thought by Bullen to be probably wholly by Middleton). (Dict. Nat. Biog.) See Beaumont.

She is sold into a fresh captivity to remove her from him, but follows her and rescues her unharmed from the harem of the Emir of Babylon. (Scandberg.) Boccaccio used the story in his prose "Il Filocopo." It was also translated it into German. There are four English versions known, none perfect. The early English Text Society has printed one of them. Also known as Floyre et Blanchefloyr.

Florence (flor'ens). [It. Firenze and formerly Fiorenze, F. Florence, G. Florenz, L. Florentia, flowery city, from florere, bloom, flower, flourish.] The capital of the province of Florence, Italy, situated on both sides of the Arno, at the foot of spurs of the Apennines, in lat. 43° 46′ 4″ N., long. 11° 15′ 22″ E. (observatory); called "La Bella" ("the beautiful"). It is famous for its art collections (Uffizi and Pitti Palace galleries), and the beauty of its situation and environs, and has been celebrated for centuries as the leading center of Italian literature and art. Other objects of interest are the Ponte Vecchio, the Piazza della Signoria, on which are the Palazzo Vecchio and the Loggia dei Lanzi; the national library, Piazzale Duomo, with the cathedral (Santa Maria del Fiore), the campanile, archæological museum, national museum, academy of fine arts, Dante's monument, museum of San Marco; the palaces of the Strozzi, Corsini, and Medici; the Cascine, botanic gardens, and Square Michelangelo. (For the principal churches, see below.) The city was the birthplace of Dante, the residence of Boccaccio, and of the Humanists (Bruni, Poggio, etc.), and the scene of the labors of Cimabue, Giotto, Andrea Pisano, Brunelleschi, Luca della Robbia, Ghiberti, Donatello, Luca Signorelli, Fra Angelico, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Michelangelo, Fra Bartolommeo del Sarto, and other distinguished artists. Florence rose to prosperity in the 12th century, when the inhabitants of Fiesole removed thither, and in time became a strong commercial state. It was the scene of continual struggles between the Guelphs and Ghibellines in the 13th century. It took the leading part in the Renaissance movement. The Medici family became paramount under Cosimo de' Medici in 1434, and Florence was at its height under Lorenzo de' Medici, 1469–1492, and later. After the fall of savonarola it was a "theocratic republic" about 1495–1512, was expelled in 1498, were restored in 1512, banished in 1527, and again restored in 1530 after a siege by the emperor Charles V. In 1532 the Duchy of Tuscany was formed. In 1569 the history of Florence merges in that of Tuscany, of which it was the capital. It was the capital of the kingdom of Italy 1865–71. The celebrated Renaissance palaces of Florence are now existing, was begun in 1296. When the base of the dome was reached (1420), the space to be covered, 138 feet in diameter, was a problem. The closing of it with a dome was believed impossible; but Filippo Brunelleschi undertook it, and in 1446 completed the wonderful work which ranks supreme in architecture and is the true great triumph of the Renaissance. The dome is octagonal, slightly pointed, and surmounted by a lantern the apex of which is 387 feet above the pavement. The cathedral is 550 feet long, and 128 feet across nave and aisles. The interior is incrusted with colored marbles inlaid and arranged in panels, the general effect of which is not good. The grouping of the domes and the general space and transepts and intermediate members is extremely impressive. The decorative sculpture is most delicate, but too small in scale for the large building. Restored since 1875. The nave is 153 feet high, the aisles 96; but there are no clear square bays, making the proportions so bad that the effect of enormous size is lost. The cathedral has fine glass, sculptures, and paintings, and a very fine tomb. The Church of Santa Croce, begun in 1294 by Arnolfo, is 460 feet long and 124 wide. This is the Pantheon of Florence; among its celebrated tombs are those of Michelangelo, Leonardo (Bruni) Aretino, Church and cloister are full of monuments of artistic or historic interest. Among the frescos are several by Giotto and Gaddi, and a fine series of the Nativity by Taddeo Gaddi. San Lorenzo is one of the earliest of Renaissance churches, began in 1425 by Brunelleschi, and decorated at a later date in part by Michelangelo. It is famous for the monuments by Michelangelo in its Sagrestia Nuova of Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici. They are similar in design. Each has a seated idealized statue of the deceased in a niche above, and below a sarcophagus on which are two nude, half-reclining figures, one male and one female. The figures on the tomb of Giuliano represent Day and Night; those on that of Lorenzo, Aurora and Twilight. They are of heroic proportions, yet full of repose, and rank among the most famous works of sculpture. The Medici has been called Michelangelo's masterpiece. Of San Michele is a curious pointed church, built in 1284 by Arnolfo as a market and granary. It is in three stories, the upper ones being vaulted from a massive central column. The original arches of the original market were closed, and received beautiful tracery of window work. Between the arcades are inserted 14 niches in marble containing some of the finest of Florentine statues by Verrocchio, Ghiberti, Donatello, and others. The Church of Santa Maria degli Angeli, by Orcagna in white marble, dates from 1375, illustrating the life of the Virgin and the Virtues. San Miniato al Monte is a notable Romanesque church rebuilt in 1013, and illustrating the transition from the Byzantine to the normal Romanesque. Santa Maria Novella is a church of the 13th century, a fine example of the Italian Pointed. The campanile is lofty, with pediments and spire. The chief glory of the church is its frescos by Cimabue, Ghirlandaio, Orcagna, and Giotto. The church of Santa Maria del Carmine is architecturally of little interest since the fire of 1771, but famous for its Brancacci chapel adorned with frescos by Masaccio and Filippino Lippi illustrating the stories of Adam and Eve and of St. Peter. The Badia is the church of a former Benedictine monastery, rebuilt in the 17th century: but the exterior of the 13th-century east end remains almost perfect. The church contains superb sculptured tombs and other works by Mino da Fiesole. The beautiful campanile of 1320 is one of the architectural ornaments of Florence. The Bargello, or the palace of the Podesta of the Florentine Republic, built in the fifth century and restored after a long interval, is a massive building of hewn stone. The great rooms and halls are splendidly restored in the style of the 14th century, and are appropriated to the Museo Nazionale. The Certosa, or Carthusian monastery, founded in 1341 by Niccolo Acciaiuoli and built by Orcagna, but altered in the Renaissance, presents the appearance of a medieval fortress. The church contains much that is of value, good frescos, and handsome carved stalls. Population (estimated, 1893), 200,000.

Florence. The province in the compartimento of Tuscany, Italy, in which the city of Florence is situated. Area, 2,265 square miles. Population (1891), 815,506.

Foppington (fop'ing-ton), Lord. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Relapse," a foolish, fine gentleman, a further development of Sir Fopling Flutter. Sir Novelty Fashion in "Love's Last Shift."

He also appears as Lord Foppington in Cibber's comedy less Husband, and in Sheridan's "Trip to Scarborough," an alteration of "The Relapse."

Lord Foppington in the "Relapse" is a most splendid caricature: he is a personification of the vagary and folly of dress and external appearance in all ranks. He blasses out and dazzles sober reason with ridiculous ostentation. Still I think this character is a copy from Etherege's Sir Fopling Flutter; and upon the whole, perhaps, Sir Fopling is the more natural grotesque of the two.

Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 107.

He first appeared on the regular stage in 1820 as Douglas in Home's play of that name. His first notable success was in New York, where he played "Othello" in 1826. In 1836 he appeared in London as Spartacus in "The Gladiator." After this he played with success both in England and America, until in 1845 in London he was hissed in "Macbeth." He attributed this to Macready's influence, and shortly after, when the latter was playing Hamlet in Edinburgh, Forrest stood up in his box and hissed vehemently. It is believed that this was the original cause of the Astor Place riot in 1849, of which the immediate occasion was the attempt of Forrest's admirers to prevent Macready from appearing in the Astor Place Opera House. His last appearance in New York was in Feb., 1871, and in March of that year he appeared for the last time as an actor in Boston. He afterward, however, gave shakespearian readings, which were not successful. He left his house in Philadelphia as a home for aged actors. Here also he collected a large dramatic library. One of his most characteristic parts was Aylmere in "Jack Cade," which was written for him by Robert T. Conrad. Among his great parts were Lear, Coriolanus, Othello, Virginius, Damon, Spartacus, Tell, etc.

Fortescue (fôr'tes-kū), Sir Faithful. Died near Carisbrooke in May, 1666. A Royalist commander in the civil war in England. He served as a major in the Earl of Montgomery's army at the battle of Edgehill, during which engagement he deserted with his troop to the royal standard. He subsequently commanded a regiment of royal infantry, served under the Marquis of Ormonde in Ireland in 1647, and on the accession of Charles II. was created a constable of Carrickfergus, and created a Zouch-mann of the privy chamber.

Fortescue, George. Born at London about 1578; died in 1659. An English essayist and poet. He was the son of Roman Catholic parents, and was educated at the English college of Douay and at the English college at Rome. His chief work is "Feyth, Ancadore and Victory Gouerned by the Forti Scutu Nobili Angle" (1630). He is also credited with the authorship of the anonymous poem "The Sowles Pilgrimage to Heavenly Hierusalem" (1660).

Fortescue, Sir John. Died about 1476. An English jurist. He was made chief justice of the King's Bench in 1442. As a Lancastrian he followed Queen Margaret to Flanders in 1461, returned to England in 1471, was captured at the battle of Tewkesbury, and accepted a pardon from Edward IV. His most notable works are "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," first printed in 1537, and "On the Governance of the Kingdom of England," also entitled "The Difference between an Absolute and Limited Monarchy" and "De Dominio Regali et Politico"), first printed in 1714.

Fortescue, Sir John. Died Dec. 23, 1607. An English politician. He was a cousin of Queen Elizabeth. He was appointed to superintend the studies of Elizabeth about 1558, and was made keeper of the great wardrobe on her accession in 1558, chancellor of the exchequer in 1589, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster in 1601. On the accession of James I. in 1603 he was deprived of the chancellorship of the exchequer, but retained in his other offices. In 1604 he was defeated by Sir Francis Goodwin in a parliamentary election for Buckinghamshire. The clerk of the crown refused to receive the return of Goodwin on the ground that he was an outlaw, whereupon Fortescue was elected by virtue of a second writ. The House of Commons recognized the election of Goodwin as legal. A dispute between the king and the Commons in reference to the election resulted, under the guise of a compromise, in a victory for the Commons, who have since constantly exercised the right to decide on the legality of returns.

Fortunatus (fôr-tū-nā'tus). The hero of a popular European chap-book. When in great straits he receives from the goddess Fortune a purse which can never be emptied. He afterward takes from the fortune-teller of a sultan a hat which will transport its wearer wherever he desires. These enable him to indulge his every whim. The earliest known, and probably original, version was published at Augsburg in 1509. It has been retold in all languages, and dramatized by Hans Sachs in 1553 and by Thomas Dekker in 1600. Tieck in "Phantasus," and Chamisso in "Peter Schlemihl," have also utilized this legend. Uhland left an unfinished narrative poem, "Fortunatus and his Sons." See Old Fortunatus.

Fortunatus, Venantius Honorius Clementianus. Born at Ceneda, near Treviso, Italy, about 530; died after 600. A Latin poet, bishop of Poitiers. He was the author of 300 hymns, among them "Vexilla regis prodeunt," and probably "Pange lingua."

Fortune (fôr'tun). A short poem erroneously attributed to Chaucer by Shirley. Its subtitle is "Balladе de Visage [sometimes written Village] sans Peynture" ("The Face of the World as it really is, not Painted"). It is based partly on Boethius and partly on a portion of the "Roman de la Rose."

Fortune. A painting by Guido Reni, in the Accademia di San Luca, Rome. The goddess is represented nude, smiling, sweeping over a globe. From her raised left hand hangs a purse from which money falls. A Cupid clings to her flowing hair and to the scarf which floats behind her.

Fortune. A ship which arrived at Plymouth, Mass., Nov. 11, 1621, from London, bringing our 35 colonists and a patent, granted June 1, 1611, by the president and council of New England to John Pierce and his associates, allowing a hundred acres to be taken up for every emigrant, and empowering the grantees to make laws and set up a government. Winsor.

Fortune, The. A London theater built in 1599 for Henslowe (the pawnbroker and money-lender) and Alleyn (the comedian). It stood in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate, and in the street now called Playhouse Yard, connecting Whitecross street with Golding Lane. It was a wooden tenement, which was burned down in 1621, and was replaced by a brick edifice. In 1649 a party of soldiers broke into the edifice and pulled down the building.

Forum Boarium (fō'rum bō-ā'ri-um). [L.] The early cattle-market of ancient Rome. It was bounded on the north by the area called the Velabrum, on the east by the Palatine, on the south by the Aventine at the extremity of the Circus Maximus, and on the west by the Tiber. It is said that in the primitive gladiatorial shows were given here, and that human sacrifices were made by burial alive. Upon this forum fronts the temple of Fors Fortuna (so-called Fortuna Virilis), and in it stands the circular monument long popularly called the temple of Vesta. A number of other important temples stood on it in antiquity, among them that of Ceres, whose remains are incorporated in Santa Maria in Cosmedin. The Forum Boarium was within the Servian Wall.

Forum Julium (fō'rum jō'li-um). [L.] The earliest of the imperial fora of ancient Rome, designed to relieve the crowding of the Forum Romanum. It was begun by Julius Cæsar, and practically adjoined the northern side of the Forum Romanum at its eastern end. It was surrounded with porticos, and its central area was occupied by a richly adorned peripteral temple of Venus Genitrix. Some finely arcaded and vaulted chambers of the inclosure exist near the southwest angle: they were probably offices for legal business.

Forum of Augustus. The second of the imperial fora of ancient Rome. It adjoined the northeastern side of the Forum Julium, and was very large, rectangular in plan except that a corner was cut off at the southeast, and that a semicircular exedra indented each long side. It was inclosed by very massive walls nearly 100 feet high, and surrounded by porticos splendidly adorned with marble statues and incrustation. Toward the northeastern end of the central area rose the temple of Mars Ultor, colonnaded on three sides, and having an apse at the back. The existing remains include very impressive stretches of the inclosing wall, one of the entrances (also now called Arco de' Pantani, and some columns and walls of the temple.

Forum of Nerva. The fourth of the imperial fora of ancient Rome, a long narrow area between the Forum of Vespasian and the Forum of Augustus. It was also called Forum Transitorium because an important thoroughfare from the northeast passed through it to the Forum Romanum. and Forum Palladium from the temple of Minerva which it contained. Temple and forum were dedicated by Nerva in 97 A. D. The temple was hexastyle prostyle, with columns on the flanks and an apse at the back. Part of the cella wall toward the apse remains in place, together with two Corinthian columns of marble of the interior range of the forum, with richly ornamented entablatures, returned to the wall behind the columns. Over the entablature there is an attic on which is an elective sculptured relief of Minerva. The temple remained almost perfect until 1606, when Paul V. destroyed it to use its marbles in the Chapel of St. Paul in Santa Maria Maggiore.

Forum of Trajan. The largest and the furthest north of the imperial fora of ancient Rome, adjoining the northwest side of the Forum of Augustus, and lying between the northeastern declivity of the Capitoline Hill and the Quirinal. It consisted of three parts: the forum proper, the huge Basilica Ulpia, and the temple of Trajan, with its colonnaded inclosure. Between the temple of Trajan and the Basilica Ulpia rises the column of Trajan, beneath which was the emperor's mausoleum. To create an area for this lavish monumental display, Trajan cut away a large ridge of tufa which extended from the Capitoline to the Quirinal. The forum proper was a large rectangle surrounded by columns and double range on the sides, and a single range toward the Forum of Augustus and the Basilica Ulpia. From each side, behind the porticos, projected a large hemicycle with booth-arcades in several stories. Trajan's column was erected from that of Augustus by a splendid triumphal arch, many of whose sculptures now adorn the arch of Constantine. The forum was adorned with numbers of statues in bronze and marble, and all its buildings were roofed with gilt bronze.

Forum Olitorium (fō'rum ō-li-tō'ri-um). [L., 'vegetable-market.'] The vegetable-market of ancient Rome. It occupied the southern extremity of the Campus Martius, beneath the Capitoline Hill, stretching into the Velabrum, and separated from the Forum Boarium only by the Servian Wall. In the Forum Olitorium stood three temples side by side, two of which are identified as the temples of Spes and Juno Sospita, whose remains are built into the Church of San Nicolo in Carcere.

Forum Pacis (fō'rum pā'sis) ('Forum of Peace'), or Forum of Vespasian. The third of the imperial fora of ancient Rome. It was the furthest south of the imperial fora, and lay between the Basilica Æmilia, which fronted on the Forum Romanum. It was built to inclose the temple of Peace which was dedicated by Vespasian in 75 A. D. in honor of the taking of Jerusalem, and is described by Pliny as one of the four finest buildings of Rome. In it were dedicated the spoils of the Jewish temple, represented on the arch of Titus; and here too Vespasian placed the works of art which under Nero from Delphi and other Greek cities. A massive stretch of the exterior wall of this forum still stands, near the western end of the Basilica of Constantine, with a fine flat-arched doorway of travertine.

Forum Romanum (fō'rum rō-mā'num). The famous Roman forum which from the time of the kings formed the political center of ancient Rome. Beginning in a hollow on the eastern slope of the Capitoline Hill, it extended in a long and narrow area stretched in a direction south of east beneath the northern declivity of the Palatine. Its western end was occupied by the Comitium, or office of the archives, in front of which stood the temples of Concord and of Vespasian. On its southern side were the temple of Saturn, the Basilica Julia, the temples of Castor and Pollux and of Vesta, and on the northern side of the Curia Hostilia, Curia, the Basilica Æmilia, and the temples of Antoninus and Faustina and of Romulus. In the middle of the east end rose the temple and rostra of Julius Cæsar. The more ancient and famous rostra from which Cicero spoke were at the western end. The remains of all these buildings are considerable, and the area has been excavated and restored to a considerable degree.

Foscari (fō-kä'rē), Francesco. Died 1457. Doge of Venice 1423–57. He began in 1426 a war against Filippo Maria Visconti, duke of Milan, which resulted in the acquisition of Brescia, Bergamo, and Cremona in 1427. A second war, which lasted from 1431 to 1433, fixed the Adda as the boundary of the Venetian dominions. A war against Bologna, Milan, and Mantua, in which he was supported by Francisco Sforza and Cosmo de' Medici, resulted in the peace of Lodi, the basis of Louis XII.'s claim to Naples. The close of his reign was troubled by the machinations of his rival Giacopo Loredano. He was compelled in 1445 to abdicate, having sustained the loss of his only surviving son, Giacopo, who died in exile as the result of the tortures inflicted on him by the Council of the Ten. He formed with his son the subject of Byron's tragedy "The Two Foscari."

France (frans). [F. La France; L. Gallia, later Francia, land of the Franks: It. Francia, Sp. Francia, Pg. França, G. Frankreich.] A country of western Europe, capital Paris, bounded by Belgium and Luxemburg on the northeast, Germany (partly separated by the Vosges), Switzerland (largely separated by the Jura and Lake Geneva), and Italy (separated by the Alps) on the east, the Mediterranean and Spain (separated by the Pyrenees) on the south, and the Bay of Biscay and the Atlantic on the west. It extends from [illegible] It is bounded on the south and east by Italy, and Italy in the west and north. Besides the frontier ranges (the Pyrenees, Alps, Jura, and Vosges), the chief mountains are the Cévennes in the south, Auvergne in the center, and the mountains of the Côte-d'or (and their continuations southward). There are also the plateaus of the Morvan and Limousin in the interior, and Ardennes in the northeast. Brittany is broken and hilly. The highest mountain in France is Mont Blanc. The chief river systems are those of the Seine, Loire, Garonne, and Rhone. Parts of the Schelde, Meuse, and Moselle (Rhine) basins are in France. The largest lakes are Geneva (on the border), Annecy, and Bourget. France is the fourth European country in area and population. The leading agricultural products are grain and wine, next to these are beet-root, fruit and vegetables, and potatoes. The agricultural exports are butter, eggs, poultry, and cattle, especially to England. France has fisheries for oysters, cod, herring, mackerel, etc. Its leading mines are iron and coal. Salt and building stones are produced in large quantities. The chief manufactures are silk, cotton goods, linen, woolen goods, sugar, pottery, glass, paper, "articles of Paris," etc. The country holds the first rank in silk manufactures and exports woolens, wine, silks, etc. France is subdivided into 87 departments. The government is republican, administered by a president (term 7 years) and a senate (300 members), and a chamber of deputies (584 members). The prevailing language is French, but Basque is spoken in the southwest, Breton in the northwest, Flemish in the northeast, and Italian by a few in the southeast. The religious support of the state is Roman Catholic (adherents numbering about 36 per cent. of all), Protestant (chiefly Calvinist), and Jewish. Mohammedanism is supported in Algeria. The following are the principal colonies and possessions: in Africa—Algeria, Tunis (a French protectorate), Senegal and dependencies, French Sudan and Ivory Coast, French Guinea (Guinea, Rio Nunez, Rio Pongo, Boké, Timbo, Mandingo, etc.), Gaboon, Kongo Français, Madagascar (protectorate), French Somali (in Asia—Pondicherry, Yanaöne, Cochin China, Annam (protectorate), Cambodia (protectorate), Laos (protectorate—French Indo-China, Martinique, Guadeloupe and dependencies, St. Pierre and Miquelon, in Oceanica—New Caledonia, Tahiti, Marquesas Islands, Tubuai Islands, Wallis-Hoorn-Islands, Wallis, Raiatea, and some small acquisitions. France corresponds partly to the ancient Gaul. It was inhabited in the earliest historic times by Iberians (Aquitanians and Basques) and Celts (Gauls). Greek colonies were settled at Marseilles and elsewhere in southern France. Roman settlements were made on the Rhone, c. 125, and southern France (Provincia) was acquired by Rome. The conquest of all Gaul was effected by Cæsar in 58–51 B.C., and the country was subdivided into Roman provinces, becoming Romanized thereby. In the 5th century A.D. it was overrun by the West Goths, Burgundians, and Franks; but an invasion of the Huns under Attila was checked at Chalons (451). The Frankish monarchy (Merovingian) was established under Clovis after his defeat of the Roman governor Syagrius near Soissons in 486. A Saracen invasion was checked by Charles Martel at Tours in 732. Carolingian dynasty came into power with the accession of Pepin the Short in 752. Pepin's son Charlemagne was crowned emperor of the West in 800; but the troubles after his death led to a division of the Frankish empire at the treaty of Verdun (843). The settlement of the Normans in France took place in the beginning of the 10th century, and the accession of the Capetian dynasty in 987. France took a leading part in the Crusades. The power of the crown was increased by various sovereigns, especially by Philip II., Louis IX., Philip IV., and Louis XI. The Hundred Years' War with England occupied from about 1337 to 1453. The Valois branch of the Capetian house acceded in 1328, and continued with its branch Valois-Orleans till 1589, when the reign of the Bourbons with Henry IV. (of Navarre) in 1589. The Huguenot wars lasted from 1562 to the Edict of Nantes, 1598. The power of the crown was greatly developed by Richelieu and Louis XIV. France took a leading part in the Thirty Years' War. There were various combinations of European states against Louis XIV. (the last in the War of the Spanish Succession). France took part in the War of the Austrian Succession, in the Seven Years' War it was defeated by England, losing large possessions in America and India. It aided the United States in the Revolutionary War. The first French Revolution took place in 1789, and the republic was established in 1792. Great increase of French territory and power resulted from the wars of the Revolution. The Directory was established in 1795, the consulate in 1799, and the empire under Napoleon in 1804. Later events are the restoration of the Bourbons (1814); the Hundred Days of Napoleon (1815); the second restoration of the Bourbons (1815); the revolution of July and accession of the Orleanist family (1830); the revolution and establishment of the second republic (1848); the coup d'état by Louis Napoleon (Dec., 1851); and the establishment of the second empire with Napoleon III. (1852). France took part in the Crimean war and in the Austrian-Italian war of 1859. In the war of 1870–71 with the Prussians (the so-called Franco-German war) France was severely defeated; the empire was overthrown (Sept., 1870), and was succeeded by the third republic; and France was obliged to cede Alsace-Lorraine (1871). This disaster was followed by the Communist civil war of 1871. More recent events have been the extension of French territory or influence in southeastern Asia (now with China, ending 1885), in Tunis and western Africa, and in Madagascar; the Centennial Exposition of 1889; the efforts to overturn the existing republic by royalists, Bonapartists, and Boulangists; the leaning toward Russia (to offset the Triple Alliance); and the Panama imbroglio, culminating in 1892. (See further Local Divisions, Normandy, and the other provinces, Franco-German War and other wars; French Revolution and Napoleon.) The following is a statement of the boundaries of the provinces of France since the Cardinal de Fleury: Guienne annexed to the crown 1068; viscounty of Bourges 1100; counties of Amiens and Vermandois (in part) formally annexed to the crown 1185 (finally about 1479); county of Valois annexed 1185 (final union 1515); Normandy about 1203; Anjou about 1204 (definitely 1480); Maine about 1204 (definitely 1481); Touraine annexed to the crown about 1204 (incorporated about 1431); Narbonne (eastern Languedoc) 1229; Blois and Chartres (in part only) 1234; Blois finally in possession of the crown 1498; Poitou 1241; county of Toulouse 1270; Champagne 1285 (incorporated 1361); Montpellier acquired 1349 (by Anglo-Gaul); Berry 1465, and definitely 1601; duchy of Burgundy 1477; Brittany 1491 (incorporated 1532); Auvergne incorporated 1532; Bourbon united to the crown 1523; Foret united to the crown 1532; Boulogne acquired finally 1550; bishopric of Metz, Toul, and Verdun 1552 (formally ceded 1648); Calais 1558; Rousergue 1589 (or, according to some, in 1525); Navarre united with France 1589 (formal union 1620); Bearn 1594; Bresse, Bugey, and the pays de Gex all in 1601; part of Alsace 1648; Roussillon 1659; Dunkirk 1663; Artois 1659, 1668, 1678–79; Flanders 1678–79, 1713–15; Franche Comté (county of Burgundy) 1674; Strasburg 1681; Orange 1714 (or 1713); Lorraine 1766; Avignon and the Comtat-Venaissin 1791; remaining parts of Alsace about 1791; county of Montbeliard 1793. Nice and its territory and Savoy 1860. Of regions outside of France, Corsica was acquired 1768, Algeria 1830–47. At its height under Napoleon, France included Belgium, Holland, Germany west of the Rhine, northern Germany as far as the mouth of the Elbe and Lubeck, Valais in Switzerland, Piedmont, Liguria, Tuscany, and Latium; the kingdom of Italy (in northeastern Italy, the Illyrian provinces, and some smaller tracts were governed from France; and in French alliance or under French protection were the Rhenish Confederation, Switzerland, Spain, the Grand Duchy Warsaw, Neuchâtel, the kingdom of Naples, and various minor Italian states. Area of France, 204,092 square miles. Population (1891), 38,343,192. Area of French colonial possessions, about 3,000,000 square miles, with a population of 30,526,293.

France then—the Western or Latin Francia, as distinguished from the German Francia or Franken—properly means only the territory immediately between the Rhine, Normandy, Aquitaine, and the Duchy of Burgundy allowed homage to the French king, no one would have spoken of them as those of France. But, as the French kings, step by step, got possession of the dominions of their vassals and other neighbours, the name of France gradually spread till it took in, as it now does, by far the greater part of Gaul. The Duchy of Burgundy, Rousillon, and the Norman islands, though once under the homage of the French kings, have fallen altogether away, and have therefore never been included in the name of France; and the name of France supplanted the name of Karolingia as the name of the Western kingdom.

France, Anatole Thibault (known as Anatole), Born at Paris, April 16, 1844. A French poet and miscellaneous writer. He is principally known from his critical articles in "La Vie Littéraire," "Le Globe," "Les Débats," "Le Temps," etc., and his novel "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard" (1881).

France Antarctique (fronṡ on-tärk-tēk'). A name given by the French Huguenots to the short-lived colony on the bay of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 1555–67. Thevet and other authors extended the title to the whole of Brazil, and even to all South America.

France Équinoxiale (fronṡ ā-kē-noks-yäl'). [F., 'equinoctial France.'] A name given by some authors of the 18th century to French Guiana. It was occasionally used in official documents.

Francesca (fran-ches'kä). Piero della, surnamed di San-Sepolcro (from his place of birth), Born about 1420; died 1492. A Venetian painter. He worked in Florence (1439–45), Arezzo, Rimini, Rome, and elsewhere. He wrote "De prospectiva pingendi."

Francesca da Rimini (fran-ches'kä dä rē'mē-nē), A beautiful lady of the 13th century, daughter of Guido da Polenta, lord of Rimini, and wife of Giovanni Malatesta. The story of her love for Paolo, the young brother of her husband, and their subsequent death (about 1288) at the hand of the latter, has been told by Dante in a famous episode of the "Inferno." Silvio Pellico wrote a tragedy on the subject, and Leigh Hunt a poem. Boker also wrote a tragedy with the same title, which was successfully played in 1855. Noted pictures illustrating the story have been painted by Ingres, Cabanel, Ary Scheffer, George Frederic Watts, and others.

The character of the passionate and implacable courtesan, Francischina, conceived with singularly ability. Few figures in the Elizabethan drama are more striking than this fair vengeful fiend, who is as playful and pitiless as a tigress, whose caresses are sweet as honey and poisonous as aconite. Bullen.

Franceschini (fran-ches-kē'nē), Baldassare, Born at Volterra, Italy, about 1612; died at Florence, 1681. An Italian painter.

Franceschini, Marcantonio, Born at Bologna, Italy, April 5, 1648; died at Bologna, Dec. 24, 1728. An Italian painter.

Franche-Comté (fronṡh kōn-tā'). [F., 'free county.'] An ancient government of eastern France. It was bounded by Champagne on the northwest, Lorraine on the north, Montbelard and Switzerland on the east, Geneva, Bugey, and Bresse on the south, and Burgundy on the west. It was called in its earlier history Upper Burgundy, and often later was known as the county of Burgundy. Besançon and Dole are the chief towns. The chiefs were of Bourbon, Alsace, and Hainaut. Franche-Comté was formed in 1477; was ceded by Charles VIII. to the Hapsburgs in 1493, retaining local privileges under Spanish rule; was conquered by Louis XIV. 1668, but restored; and was again conquered in 1674 and annexed to France (formally ceded by treaties of Nimwegen 1678–79).

Franchi (fran-kē), Ansonio: pseudonym of Cristoforo Bonavino. Born at Pegli, near Genoa, Italy, Feb. 24, 1821. An Italian philosophical writer. He became a priest, but in 1849 abandoned the church on account of heterodox opinions, returning to it, however, in 1890. He became professor of philosophy at the University of Pavia in 1860, and professor at the Academy in Milan in 1863. The most notable of his works is "La filosofia delle scuole italiane" (1852), etc.

Franchi, Fabian and Louis dei. Twin brothers, characters in Bouicicault's play "The Corsican Brothers." The mysterious sympathy between them, a family inheritance, brings Fabian from his country home to Paris to avenge the death of Louis in a duel, revealed to him in a new vision at the time of its occurrence. Both parts are played by one actor.

Franci (fran'si). See the extract.

Even so early as the reign of Lewis the Pious, one writer distinguished Franci and Germani, meaning by the former the people of the Western Kingdom. Gradually the name was, in the usage of Gaul and of Europe, thoroughly fixed in this sense. The Merwings, the Karlings, the Capets, all alike called themselves Reges Francorum; Francus having of course totally changed its meaning in the meanwhile. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 189.

Francia (fran'shiä). The land of the Franks. The name varied in meaning with the extent of the Frankish power. Western Francia was Neustria, which grew into France. Eastern Francia became Franconia.

As for the mere name of Francia, like other names of the kind, it changed its local use with political changes and the wanderings of the people from whom it was derived. After many such changes of meaning, it gradually settled down as the name for those parts of Germany on and where it still abides. There are the Teutonic or Austrian Francia, part of which still keeps the name of Franken or Franconia, and the Romance or Neustrian Francia, which by various annexations has grown into modern France. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 121.

Francia (frän'chä), (Francesco Raibolini), Born 1450: died Jan. 5, 1518. An Italian painter. The name Francia is probably an abbreviation of the full name Francesco, by his son. He was better known as a goldsmith than as a painter, and one of his most successful medallists of the time. In 1508 he came under the influence of Raphael. Of his frescos only two remain, nine in the Bentivoglio Oratory and the Pietà at Bologna. His easel-pictures and portraits in oil are numerous, and show the tendencies of Perugini and Raphael so strongly that some have long been attributed to one or the other painter.

Francia (frän'sē-ä), José Gaspar Rodriguez, called Dr. Francia. Born in Asuncion, 1761: died there, Sept. 20, 1840. A dictator of Paraguay. He was a lawyer, and in May, 1811, was made a member of the supreme junta which soon forged itself into the expulsion of the Spanish governor. He quickly took the lead in affairs: was made consul in Oct., 1811; dictator for three years in 1814; and dictator for life in 1817. From the first he governed with absolute power, and his orders became the only law of the country. Aiming to cut off Paraguay from intercourse with the rest of the world, he restricted foreign commerce to a few absolutely necessary articles. Except in rare instances nobody was allowed to leave the country, and this rule was enforced on the few foreigners who entered it. He regulated agriculture as he pleased, and would not permit the accumulation of wealth. His real or supposed enemies were imprisoned and executed with secrecy and always without any real trial. Primary education was somewhat encouraged, and quarrels with the surrounding powers were avoided, so that during the whole time he had war.

Franciabigio (frän-chä-bē'jō), Francesco di Cristofano. Born at Florence about 1480: died there, about 1525. An Italian painter, a pupil and imitator of Andrea del Sarto.

Francis (fran'sis) I. (of Austria: Francis II. of the Holy Roman Empire). [The E. name Francis from F. François, Pg. Francisco, It. Francesco, G. Franciscus, Franz, from ML. Franciscus, Frankish, of France, from Francus, Frank, Francia, France.] Born at Florence, Feb. 12, 1768: died at Vienna, March 2, 1835. Emperor of Austria, son of the emperor Leopold II. Born to succeed in 1792. He joined in 1793 the first coalition against France, but was forced by the successes of Napoleon in Italy to conclude (Oct. 17, 1796) the peace of Campo-Formio (which see). In 1799 he joined the second coalition against France, but in consequence of the victories of Napoleon at Marengo (June 14, 1800), and Moreau at Hohenlinden (Dec. 3, 1800), he accepted (Feb. 9, 1801) the peace of Lunéville, which in the main confirmed the peace of Campo-Formio. He joined the third coalition against France in 1805, but was forced by the victory of Napoleon at Austerlitz (Dec. 2, 1805) to conclude (Dec. 26, 1805) the peace of Pressburg, by which Austria was deprived of Venetia and Tyrol. Having already proclaimed himself hereditary emperor of Austria in 1804, he formally abdicated the title of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806. He declared war against France in 1809, but was forced by the victory of Napoleon over the archduke Charles at Wagram (July 5–6, 1809) to conclude (Oct. 14, 1809) the peace of Vienna, by which Austria lost 32,000 square miles of territory. His daughter Maria Louisa married Napoleon in 1810. He sided with France against Russia in 1812, joined the Allies in 1813, and acquired by the Congress of Vienna more territory than he had lost in his previous wars with France.

Francis I.

He joined the Holy Alliance in 1815, and the remainder of his reign was devoted to a policy of reaction under the guidance of Metternich.

Francis I. Born at Cognac, France, Sept. 12, 1494; died at Rambouillet, France, March 31, 1547. King of France, son of Charles, count of Angoulême, and cousin-german of Louis XII. He succeeded to the throne in 1515. In the same year he conquered by the victory of Marignano (Sept. 13-14) Milan. The sovereignty of which he claimed by inheritance through his great-grandmother Valentina Visconti. In 1516 he concluded a concordat with the Pope which rescinded the pragmatic sanction of 1438, and vested in the crown the right of nominating to vacant benefices. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the imperial dignity in 1519, and the remainder of his reign was chiefly occupied by four wars against his victor-rival, the emperor Charles V., who advanced claims to Milan and the duchy of Burgundy. During the first war, which broke out in 1521, he was taken captive at Pavia in 1525, and kept prisoner until the peace of Madrid in 1526. During the second war, which broke out in 1527, he was supported by the Pope, Venice, and Francesco Sforza. It was concluded by the peace of Cambray in 1529. The third war broke out in 1536 and was ended by the truce of Nice in 1538. The fourth war, which broke out in 1542, was terminated with the peace of Crespy in 1544, which left him in possession of Burgundy while the emperor retained Milan. During the last two wars his principal ally was Soliman the Magnificent, sultan of Turkey.

Francis II. Born at Fontainebleau, France, Jan. 19, 1543: died at Paris, Dec. 5, 1560. King of France, eldest son of Henry II. whom he succeeded in 1559. He married Mary Queen of Scots in 1558.

Francis I. (Stephen). Born Dec. 8, 1708: died at Innsbruck, Tyrol, Aug. 18, 1765. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Leopold, duke of Lorraine. He married in 1736 Maria Theresa of Austria, whose co-regent he became on her accession in 1740 to the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria. He was elected emperor in 1745.

C. B. He wrote numerous papers, under various pseudonyms, in support of the Whig party, and has been accredited with the authorship of "Junius's Letters," chiefly on the evidence adduced by Charles Chabot, who compared the handwriting of Junius with that of Francis.

Francis Borgia, Saint. See Borgia, Saint Francesco.

Francis Joseph I. Born at Vienna, Aug. 18, 1830. Emperor of Austria, eldest son of the archduke Francis Charles by the princess Sophia, daughter of Maximilian I. of Bavaria. He succeeded to the throne Dec. 2, 1848, on the abdication of his uncle Ferdinand I. He found at his accession widespread revolutions in progress in Italy and Hungary. The pacification of Italy was accomplished by the decisive victory of Radetzky over the insurgents and their ally, Charles Albert of Sardinia, at Novara, March 23, 1849. The emperor took part in person in the campaign in Hungary, which was subjugated with the assistance of the Russians. He was present at Világos, Aug. 13, 1849, at the render of the Hungarian dictator Gorgey at Világos, Aug. 13, 1849. Threatened with the loss of his Italian dominion by an intrigue between the courts of France and Sardinia, the emperor invaded Sardinia April 29, 1859. He was defeated in person by the allied forces of France and Sardinia at the battle of Solferino June 24, and signed the preliminaries of peace at Villafranca July 11, which were ratified by the peace of Zurich Nov. 10, 1859. By this peace he ceded Lombardy to Napoleon III., who surrendered it to Sardinia. He carried on, in alliance with Prussia, a war against Denmark Feb. 1 Oct. 30, 1864, by which the allies conquered the duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg. Disagreement as to the disposition of these duchies brought about the Austro-Prussian war, in which Austria was supported by the federal army of the German Confederation, and Prussia by Italy. The Austro-Prussian war, between hostilities declared June 15 and July 3, 1866, gained the decisive battle of Sadowa or Königgratz. The emperor concluded peace with Prussia at Prague Aug. 23, 1866, and with Italy at Vienna Oct. 3, 1866. In accordance with these treaties Austria ceded Venice to Italy and was excluded from the German Confederation. Austria-Hungary remained under the alliance with Prussia. The unsuccessful termination of the war with Prussia induced the emperor to adopt a new fundamental law for the Hapsburg dominions, which was proclaimed Dec. 31, 1867, during the ministry of Count Beust. By this fundamental law the Hungarian constitution was restored and the present dualistic form of government introduced into the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Sept., 1871, during the ministry of Count Andrássy, he concluded with the German Empire and Russia the Dreikaiserbund for the maintenance of the European peace. The Dreikaiserbund was practically dissolved at the Congress of Berlin June 13-July 13, 1878, at which Austria demanded and obtained permission to occupy the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which had been hostile to Austria. In 1883 he concluded the Dreibund with the German Empire and Italy. He married the princess Elizabet Amalie Eugenie, daughter of Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, Dec. 24, 1853. His only son, the crown prince Rudolph, committed suicide (?) Jan. 28, 1889.

Francis of Assisi (äs-sē'zē), Saint (Giovanni Francesco Bernardone). Born at Assisi, Italy, in 1182: died at Assisi, Oct. 4, 1226. A celebrated Italian monk and preacher. He turned, after a serious illness in his youth, to a life of ascetic devotion, and in 1210 founded the order of the Franciscans, whose rule was formally confirmed by Innocent III. in 1223. After a visit to Egypt in 1219, on which he preached before the sultan, he retired as a hermit to Monte Alverno, where, according to the legend, he experienced the stigmata. He was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1228, and is commemorated on Oct. 4.

Francis of Paula (pou'lä), Saint. Born at Paola (Paula), Cosenza, Italy, 1416: died at Plessis-lez-Tours, Indre-Loire, France, April 2, 1507. An Italian monk, the founder of the order of Minims (the name is a play upon St. Francis) in 1436. The statutes of the order were confirmed, and Francis was appointed its superior-general, by Pope Sixtus IV., in 1474.

Francis of Sales (sälz; F. pron. sāl), Saint. Born at Sales, near Annecy, Savoy, 1567: died at Lyons, Dec. 28, 1622. A Savoyard bishop, consultor-bishop (1599) and later (1602) bishop of Geneva, founder with Madame de Chantal of the order of the Visitation in 1610. He wrote "Traité de l'amour de Dieu," etc. He is commemorated on Jan. 29.

Francisca (fran-sis'kä). A nun in Shakspere's "Measure for Measure."

Franciscans (fran-sis'kanz). An order of mendicant friars founded by St. Francis of Assisi, Italy, authorized by the Pope in 1210, and more formally ratified in 1223. In addition to the usual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, special stress is laid upon preaching and ministry to the body and soul. Related various names, such as Minorites, Barefooted Friars, and Gray Friars, the order spread rapidly throughout Europe: among its members were Alexander of Hales, Duns Scotus, Roger Bacon, Occam, Popes Sixtus V. and Clement XIV., and other eminent men; and the order was long noted for its rivalry with the Dominicans. Differences early appeared as to the severity of the rule, which culminated in the 14th century in the division of the order into two great classes, the Observantines or the servants and the Conventuals: the former follow a more rigorous, the latter a milder rule. The general of the Observantines is minister-general of the entire order. The order has been noted for missionary zeal, but suffered considerably in the Reformation and the French Revolution. The usual distinguishing features of the garb are a gray or dark-brown cowl, a girdle, and sandals.

Dominic's theologians were called already Fratri Predicatori; Francis therefore modestly placed himself and his companions below their order as the Fratri Minori, lesser brethren. Minorite Friars. They were both offshoots of the Augustinian monks, both were Austin Friars: whether Black Friars or Gray Friars. The Dominicans were in black; and these Franciscans went in coarse grey gowns, bare-footed and bare-headed.

Franconia (frang-kō'ni-ä), G. Franken (fräng'ken). [Mil. Francomm, G. Franken, land of the Franks.] One of the four great duchies of the old German kingdom: also known as Francia. It lay chiefly in the valley of the Main, but extended west of the Rhine, being bounded by Saxony on the north and Alamannia or Swabia on the south. It broke up into various small districts (the Palatinate, Würzburg, Bamberg, etc.). In the division of the empire under Maximilian, it was made a circle. It now denotes a region whose center is further to the east than that of the ancient duchy. This is divided into Upper, Middle, and Lower Franconia (see below).

Franconia and Francomia are etymologically the same word; the difference in their modern forms is simply owing to the necessity of avoiding confusion in Latin as evoked in early medieval Latinity by spelling of Francia occidentalis and Francia orientalis. Francia Latina and Francia Teutonica. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 172.

She fitted out five ships between 1850 and 1857 to search for the missing Arctic expedition commanded by her husband. The ship, the Fox, brought back intelligence of its fate. She was awarded the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society in 1860, in recognition of her services in the search for the missing explorers.

Franklin, Sir John. Born April 16, 1786; died June 11, 1847. A celebrated Arctic explorer. He was the son of Willingham Franklin of Spilsby in Lincolnshire. He entered the royal navy in his youth; served at the battle of Copenhagen in 1805, and in the expedition against New Orleans in 1815; commanded the brig Trent in the Arctic expedition under Captain Buchan in 1818; commanded an exploring expedition to the northern coast of North America 1819–22; commanded a similar expedition 1825–27; was knighted in 1829; and was lieutenant-governor of Van Diemen's Land 1836–43. In 1845 he was appointed to the command of an expedition, consisting of the Erebus and the Terror, Captain Crozier, sent out by the British admiralty in search of the northwest passage. The expedition sailed from Greenhithe, May 18, 1845, and was last spoken of on the entrance of Lancaster Sound, July 26, 1845. Thirty-nine relief expeditions, public and private, were sent out from England and America in search of the missing explorers between 1847 and 1857. In the last-mentioned year the Fox yacht, Captain Leopold McClintock, was sent by Lady Franklin. McClintock found traces of the missing ships, and his search confirmed previous rumors of its total destruction. From a paper containing an entry by Captain Fitzjames of the missing expedition, it was learned that Franklin died June 11, 1847, having in the previous year penetrated to within 12 miles of the northern extremity of King William's Land.

Franklin, William. Born at Philadelphia, 1729; died in England, Nov. 17, 1813. An illegitimate son of Benjamin Franklin. He was royal governor of New Jersey 1763–76, and sided with the loyalists in the Revolution.

Franklin, William Buel. Born at York, Pa., Feb. 27, 1823. An American general. He was graduated at West Point in 1843, served in the Mexican war, and became a captain in the regular army in 1857 and a colonel in 1861. He commanded a brigade in Heintgleman's division at the battle of Ball Run July 21, 1861, and commanded a corps at Malvern Hill July 1, and at Antietam Sept. 17, 1862. He led a grand division of Burnside's army at Fredericksburg Dec. 13, 1862, and commanded a division of Banks's army in the Red River campaign of 1864. He resigned in 1866.

Franklin's Tale, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is said in the prologue to be from a French lay. The story is that of Beaucreux's fifth noble of the tenth day in the "Decameron," and is introduced also in the fifth book of his "Filocopo." It relates the sorrows and triumph of Dorigen, the faithful wife of Arviragus. The franklin who tells the tale is a white-headed Epicurean country gentleman:

> "With oute bake mete was never his hous,
> Of fish and flesh, and that so plenteous
> It snewed in his hous of mete and drynke."

Frankly (frangk'li). A character in Cibber's comedy "The Refusal, or The Ladies' Philosophy."

Franks (frangks). [Usually explained from the OHG. form, as from OHG. francho*, franka* = AS. franca, a spear, javelin, = Icel. frakki, also frækka (prob. from AS.), a kind of spear; the Franks being thus lit. 'Spear-men,' as Saxons were 'Sword-men' (see Saxon). The notion of 'free' associated with Frank is apparently later.] The name assumed in the 3d century A. D. by a confederation of German tribes (Sicambri, Bructeri, Chamavi, etc.). It was divided by the 4th century into the three groups the Catti, the Ripuarian Franks, and the Salian Franks, and the Salian Franks dwelling along the lower Rhine. The Merovingian monarchy of the Salian Franks was established in northern Gaul under Clovis (481-511). The accession of the Carolingians under Pepin occurred in 752. See Verdun, Treaty of.

As late as the reign of Frederick Barbarossa, the name of Frank was still used, and used too with an air of triumph, as equivalent to the name of German.

He married, 1856, daughter of William I. of Prussia in 1856. In the Seven Weeks' War (1866) he sided with Austria.

Frederick III. Born at Haderslehen, Schleswig, March 18, 1609; died at Copenhagen, Feb. 9, 1670. King of Denmark and Norway. He entered into an alliance with Holland, Poland, and Brandenburg in 1657 against Charles X. Gustavus of Sweden. He was totally defeated by Charles Gustavus (who crossed the Little Belt on the ice in 1658), and was forced to conclude important territorial cessions at the peace of Roeskilde, Feb. 26, 1658. The war being renewed in the same year by Charles Gustavus, who had invaded the hereditary monarchy of Denmark, he defended himself with great spirit until relieved by an allied army under the elector Frederick William of Brandenburg, and by the Dutch fleet. He signed, May 27, 1660, the peace of Copenhagen, which in the main confirmed the provisions of the peace of Roeskilde. By a coalition of the clergy with the bourgeoisie against the nobility in 1660 he succeeded in changing Denmark from an elective limited to a hereditary absolute monarchy.

Frederick IV. Born at Copenhagen, Oct. 11, 1671; died at Copenhagen, Oct. 12, 1730. King of Denmark and Norway, son of Christian V. whom he succeeded in 1699. Shortly after his accession he formed an alliance with Peter the Great and Augustus II., king of Poland and elector of Saxony, against Charles XII. of Sweden, and invaded Holstein. He signed the peace of Travendal, Aug. 18, 1700, on the defeat of Charles at Pultowa in 1709, he renewed the alliance with Peter the Great and Augustus against Charles, and this alliance was subsequently joined by Saxony and Hanover. After the death of Charles before Frederickshall, he concluded with Sweden a separate treaty at Frederiksborg, July 3, 1720, in which Sweden renounced its right of exemption from customs duties in the Sound and abandoned its ally, the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp, who was in the following year deprived of his sovereignties in Schleswig.

Frederick V. Born at Copenhagen, March 31, 1723; died Jan. 14, 1766. King of Denmark and Norway, son of Christian VI. whom he succeeded in 1746. He encouraged the arts and sciences with a liberality which attracted numerous distinguished foreigners to Denmark, including the poet Ingemann and the poet Klopstock. He sent in 1761, Niebuhr and others on a scientific expedition to Egypt and Arabia.

Frederick VI. Born at Copenhagen, Jan. 28, 1768; died at Copenhagen, Dec. 3, 1839. King of Denmark and Norway. He became regent in 1784 for his imbecile father, Christian VII., whom he succeeded in 1808. He adopted at the beginning of the Napoleonic wars a policy of strict neutrality. Having joined the Northern Maritime League, Dec. 16, 1800, to oppose forcibly resisting by force the interference of the English with neutral merchantmen upon the high seas he sustained, in the war which presently broke out between England and the league, a decisive defeat at the battle of Copenhagen, April 2, 1801. He subsequently joined the Continental League, in consequence of the bombardment of Copenhagen, Sept. 2, 1807, and the seizure by the English of the Danish fleet in the midst of peace. He refused to join the coalition against Napoleon in 1813, and for the time was punished by the allied powers with the loss of Norway, which was united with Sweden in 1814.

Frederick VII. Born at Copenhagen, Oct. 6, 1808; died at Glucksburg, Schleswig, Nov. 15, 1863. King of Denmark, son of Christian VIII., whom he succeeded in 1848.

He married Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I. of England, in 1613. In 1619, as the head of the German Protestant Union, he accepted the crown of Bohemia, whose estates were in rebellion against Ferdinand of Styria. He lost both Bohemia and his hereditary dominions in consequence of the defeat of his general Christian of Anhalt by the Imperialists at the battle on the White Hill, Nov. 8, 1620.

Frederick I., surnamed Barbarossa ('Red-beard'; G. Rothart). The most noted emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, of the Hohenstaufen line, son of Frederick II., duke of Swabia, and nephew of Conrad III., whom he succeeded as King of Germany in 1152. He was crowned emperor at Rome by Hadrian IV. in 1155. His reign was chiefly occupied by wars against the turbulent German nobility, and by six expeditions to Italy for the purpose of restoring the imperial authority in the republican cities of Lombardy 1154–55, 1158–62, 1163, 1166–68, 1174–77, and 1184–86. In 1176 he was, in consequence of the defection of the powerful nobility of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, defeated by the Lombards at the battle of Legnano, and was compelled to accept the definitive peace of Constance in 1183, by which he renounced all regalian rights in the cities. (See Lombard League, and Crusades, Third.) In 1189 he punished Henry the Lion by putting him under the ban of the empire and depriving him of his fiefs. In 1189 he joined the Third Crusade, on which he was drowned in the Kalykadnos in Asia Minor.

Frederick II. Born at Jesi, near Ancona, Italy, Dec. 26, 1194; died at Fiorentino (Firenzuola), Dec. 13, 1250. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry VI. and Constance, heiress of the Two Sicilies. He at an orphan in 1198, he was brought up under the wardship of the Pope as feudal superior of the Two Sicilies. He assumed the government of the Two Sicilies in 1208. In 1212 he was brought forward by the Pope as a political tool to oppose Otto IV., who had opposition to King Otto IV. with whom the Pope had quarrelled, and was elected by the Ghibelline party, the traditional opponents of the Guelphs, by whom Hohenstaufen to be represented. He was crowned at Aachen 1215, Otto having been totally defeated at Bouvines in the year previous. He was crowned emperor at Rome by Honorius III. in 1220. He continued the policy of his house of attempting to perfect the union of Italy and Germany into one empire, in which he was opposed by the Pope and the Lombard League. In 1228–29 he conducted a crusade to the Holy Land, and procured the cession of Jaffa, Sada, Jerusalem, and Nazareth from the Saracens.

Frederick III., surnamed "The Handsome." Born 1286; died Jan. 13, 1330. King of Germany, son of Albert I., whom he succeeded as duke of Austria in 1308. He was chosen king in 1314 in opposition to Louis IV., by whom he was defeated and captured at Mühldorf in 1322.

Frederick III. (IV. as King of Germany). Born at Innsbruck, Tyrol, Sept. 21, 1415; died at Linz, Austria, Aug. 19, 1493. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was elected emperor in 1440, and was the last German emperor crowned at Rome (1452).

Frederick I. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, July 11 (21), 1657; died at Berlin, Feb. 25, 1713. King of Prussia, son of Frederick William, the Great Elector, whom he succeeded (as Frederick III. of Brandenburg) in 1688. He was crowned as the first king of Prussia in 1701. He founded the University of Halle and the Academy of Sciences.

Frederick II., surnamed "The Great." Born at Berlin, Jan. 24, 1712; died at Sans Souci, near Potsdam, Aug. 17, 1786. King of Prussia 1740–86, son of Frederick William I. and Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George I. of England. In the year in which Frederick ascended the throne, the emperor Charles VI. died without male issue. He was succeeded by his daughter Maria Theresa by virtue of the pragmatic sanction (which see), the validity of which was disputed by the Elector of Bavaria and other claimants. Frederick embraced the opportunity presented by the insecurity of her title to invade (1740) Silesia, to part of which he had claim. He defeated the Austrians at Mollwitz in 1741, and at Chotusitz in 1742, and in 1742 concluded the treaty of Breslau and Berlin, by which in return for the cession of Silesia he withdrew from the alliance which he had in the meantime entered into with France and Bavaria against Austria. In 1744, alarmed by the successes of Austria against France and Bavaria, he entered into a second alliance with those powers, defeated the Austrians and Saxons at Hohenfriedberg in 1745, defeated the Austrians at Soor in 1745, and in 1745 concluded the peace of Dresden, which confirmed the treaty of Breslau and Berlin. With a view to regaining Silesia, Maria Theresa concluded alliances with Russia (1746) and Poland (1745), whereupon Frederick, anticipating the allies, invaded Saxony in 1756. In the ensuing war, called the Seven Years' War, he was supported by Britain. He defeated the Austrians at Lobositz, the self master of Saxony by the defeat of the Austrians at Lobositz in 1756. In 1757 he invaded Bohemia and defeated the Austrians at Prague, but was defeated at Kolin by Marshal Daun, who drove him out of Bohemia. He defeated the French and Austrians at Rossbach and the Austrians and Russians in the same year. In 1758 he defeated the Russians at Zorndorf. In 1759 he was defeated by the Austrians and Russians at Kunersdorf. Berlin was taken by the Russians in 1760, England withdrew her subsidies in 1761, and Frederick was reduced to desperation. In 1762, however, Elizabeth of Russia died, and fortune changed. Peter III. Elizabeth's successor, concluded peace with him, and the prospective defection of France caused Maria Theresa to sign in 1763 the treaty of Hubertsburg, which confirmed the treaty of Breslau and Berlin, including that of 1742. In 1772 he joined with Russia and Austria in the partition of Poland, by which he added Polish Prussia to his dominions. In 1778–1779 he took part in the War of the Bavarian Succession (which see), and in 1785 formed the League of Princes, of the German Princes, by which he frustrated the design of the emperor Joseph II. to acquire Bavaria in exchange for the Austrian Netherlands. He left behind him published in 30 volumes 1846–57. His life has been written by Preuss, Forster, Droysen, Carlyle, Von Ranke, and others.

Frederick III. Born at Potsdam, Oct. 18, 1831; died there, June 15, 1888. German emperor and king of Prussia, March 9–June 15, 1888, son of William I. of Prussia (afterward German emperor). He married Victoria, daughter of Queen Victoria, in 1858, commanded the second Prussian army in 1866, and the third army in the Franco-Prussian war, in which he took part in the victories of Weissenburg, Worth, and Sedan.

Frederick I., surnamed "The Warlike." Born at Altenburg, Germany, March 29, 1369; died at Altenburg, Jan. 4, 1428. Margrave of Meissen, Elector and Duke of Saxony. He was the son of the Landgrave of Thuringia, and was created elector and duke of Saxony in 1423 as a reward for his services to the emperor in the Hussite war. His army was defeated by the Hussites at Aussig in 1426. He founded the University of Leipsic in 1409

Frederick II., surnamed "The Meek." Born Aug. 22, 1412; died at Leipsic, Sept. 7, 1464. Elector and Duke of Saxony, son of Frederick I., whom he succeeded in 1428.

Frederick III., surnamed "The Wise." Born at Torgau, Prussia, Jan. 17, 1463; died at Annaburg, near Torgau, May 5, 1525. Elector of Saxony. He succeeded to the electorate in 1486; founded the University of Wittenberg in 1502; declined the imperial crown and advocated the election of Charles V. in 1519; gave protection to Luther from 1517 on, and when returning from Worms, where he had been proscribed, and secreted in the castle of Wartburg (1521–22).

Frederick I. Born at Treptow, Farther Pomerania, Nov. 21, 1754; died Oct. 30, 1816. King of Würtemberg. He succeeded his father Frederic Eugene as duke of Wurtemberg in 1797. Having taken part in the second coalition against France, he was deprived by the peace of Lunéville (Feb., 1801) of his possessions on the left bank of the Rhine, for which he was indemnified by a number of monasteries, abbeys, and imperial cities (including Reutlingen, Esslingen, and Heilbronn), and the title of elector. He sided with Napoleon against the third coalition, with the result that his dominions were increased by cessions from Austria and recognized as a kingdom by the peace of Pressburg, Dec. 26, 1805. He joined the Confederation of the Rhine July 12, 1806. After the defeat of Napoleon at the battle of Leipsic, he joined the Allies (Nov. 8, 1813), but the treaty of Vienna left him in undisturbed possession of his acquisitions.

Frederick Louis. Born at Hannover, Jan. 6, 1707: died at Leicester House, London, March 20, 1751. Prince of Wales 1729–51, eldest son of George II. He married Augusta, daughter of Frederick, duke of Saxe-Gotha, in 1736, and was father of George III. He was the leader of the opposition against Walpole and the king.

Fredericksburg (fred'ér-iks-bèrg). A city in Spottsylvania County, Virginia, 50 miles southsouthwest of Washington. Here, Dec. 13, 1862, was fought one of the severest battles of the Civil War. The Confederates (about 80,000) under Lee, occupying a strong position on the heights, repulsed an attack made on them by the Federals under Burnside, with great loss. The Confederate losses amounted to 608 killed, 4,116 wounded, and 653 captured or missing (total, 5,377); the Federal losses amounted to 1,180 killed, 9,600 wounded, 1,769 captured or missing (total, 12,653). Population (1890), 4,528.

Frederick William, called "The Great Elector." Born at Berlin, Feb. 16, 1620; died April 29, 1688. Elector of Brandenburg 1640–88, son of George William. His accession he found his dominions wasted by the Thirty Years' War, which was then in progress. By skilful diplomacy and great economy in other directions, he succeeded in ridding his country of foreign soldiery and in raising an army of 30,000 men, which secured for him respectful treatment at the peace of Westphalia in 1648. In 1655, on the outbreak of war between Sweden and Poland, he took sides with the former power against the latter. The Poles were defeated at Warsaw in 1656, and were forced in 1657 to purchase his assistance by the cession of the sovereignty of the duchy of Prussia, which he held as a fief of Poland. He joined an alliance with Holland in 1672, with a view to frustrating the designs of Louis XIV. against that country; an alliance which was subsequently joined by the emperor and Spain. In 1675 at Fehrbellin he defeated the Swedes, who had invaded Brandenburg as the allies of France; but although he made large conquests in Swedish Pomerania, he was compelled by France to return them at the separate peace of St. Germain-en-Laye (1679) in return for the cession of the county of Friesland.

Frederick William. Born Aug. 20, 1802: died at Horzowitz, near Prague, Jan. 6, 1875. Elector of Hesse. He succeeded to the electorate in 1847, and sided with Austria in the Austro-Prussian war (1866), with the result that his electorate was incorporated with Prussia by the peace of Prague, Aug. 23, 1866.

Frederick William I. Born Aug. 14, 1688: died May 31, 1740. King of Prussia 1713–40, son of Frederick I. He acquired Stettin and part of Pomerania by the peace of Stockholm in 1720, at the close of the Northern War, in which he had taken part against Sweden; and by the establishment of a formidable army laid the foundation of Prussia's military power.

Frederick William III. Born Sept. 25, 1744: died Nov. 16, 1797. King of Prussia 1786–97, nephew of Frederick the Great. He formed an alliance with Austria in 1792 for the purpose of restoring Louis XVI. of France, but concluded the separate peace of Basel with the revolutionary government of France in 1795. He took part in the second and third partitions of Poland in 1793 and 1795 respectively.

Frederick William III. Born Aug. 3, 1770; died June 7, 1840. King of Prussia 1797–1840, son of Frederick William II. He refused to join the third coalition against France in 1805; declared war against France in 1806; signed the treaty of Tilsit in 1807; joined France against Russia in 1812; joined in the War of Liberation in 1813; was present at the Congress of Vienna in 1815; and joined the Holy Alliance in 1815.

Frederick William IV. Born Oct. 15, 1795; died at Sans Souci, near Potsdam, Prussia, Jan. 2, 1861. King of Prussia 1840–61, son of Frederick William III. He was compelled by a revolutionary movement in 1848 to grant a constitution, and in 1849 declined the imperial crown offered him by the German National Assembly at Frankfort. As he was rendered incompetent to reign by a serious malady, his brother (afterward William I.) became regent in 1858.

Friday (frī'da). [From Frigga, a Teutonic goddess, in part identified with the Roman Venus, AS. Frige day, etc., being a translation of the Roman name of this day, dies Veneris, dies Veneris.] The sixth day of the week. Friday is the Mohammedan Sabbath, or day of assembly. It is said in the Mohammedan traditions to have been established by divine command as a day of worship for Adam and his descendants, as being the day on which Adam was created and received into paradise, the day on which he was expelled from it, the day on which he repented, and the day on which he died. It will accordingly be the same traditions, be the day of the resurrection. In the Roman and Eastern and Anglican churches, all Fridays except Christmas day (when it occurs on Friday) are generally observed as fasts of obligation or days of abstinence, in memory of the crucifixion of Christ, an event which is especially commemorated annually on Good Friday. The Christian dislike to Friday is popularly regarded with superstition, and is considered an unlucky day for beginning any enterprise. To spill more or less than a pint on Friday is considered an especially bad omen. Until recently it was common for criminals under sentence of capital punishment to be executed on Friday: hence Friday is sometimes called hangman's day.

A German politician, traveler, and author, nephew of Friedrich Fröbel. He took part in the revolutionary movement at Vienna in 1848, and in 1897 founded at Munich the "Süddeutsche Presse," which he conducted until 1873. He was appointed consul of the Hanseatic Empire at Smyrna in 1875, and held a similar post at Algiers 1876–80. His chief works are "System der sozialen Politik" (1847), "Aus Amerika" (1857), "Theorie der Politik" (1861–64), "Die Wirthschaft des Menschengeschlechts" (1873–76), "Die realistische Weltansicht und die utilitarische Civilisation" (1881), and "Ein Lebenslauf" (1890–91).

Frobisher (frō'bish-ėr), Sir Martin. Died in 1594. An English navigator. He was of a family of Welsh origin. He was at Aldborough, West Riding of Yorkshire. He commanded an expedition in search of the northwest passage in 1576, on which he discovered the bay which bears his name, Frobisher Bay. One of his sailors having brought home a piece of ore supposed to contain gold, he was sent out again in command of two expeditions in search of it, in 1577–78. On both occasions, however, the ore which he brought home proved worthless. He fought with distinction against the Great Armada in 1588.

Frobisher Bay. An arm of the ocean extending about 200 miles into Baffin Land, in the north polar regions. It was until recently called Frobisher Strait.

Frog (frog), Nicholas or Nic. A nickname for the Dutch in Arbuthnot's "Law is a Bottomless Pit," in "The History of John Bull."

Frogmore (frog'mor) Lodge. A mansion near Windsor Castle, England. It was the residence of queen Victoria's mother, and the principal mausoleum erected by the queen to her husband.

Frogs (frogz), The. A famous comedy by Aristophanes. It was exhibited in 405 B. C., and obtained the first prize.

The plot (of "The Frogs") is separated into two parts: first, the adventures of Bacchus on his journey to Hades in search of a good poet, Sophocles and Euripides being lately dead; and secondly, the poetical contest of Eschylus and Euripides for the high virtue of Eschylus. These subjects are logically though loosely connected together, but remain as strongly of the dramatic economy of the very poet whose Aristophanes is here at such pains vehemently. No analysis can reproduce the irrelevant liliancy of the piece, which consists in all manner of comic situations, departures, parables, and the queerest blunders.
Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 455.

Fröhlich (frē'lich), Abraham Emanuel. Born at Brugg, Aargau, Switzerland, Feb. 1, 1796; died at Baden, Aargau, Dec. 1, 1865. A German-Swiss poet, best known as a writer of fables (published 1825).

Frohsdorf (frōs'dorf). A village and castle about 50 miles south of Vienna. It is noted as having been the headquarters of the French Legitimist party from 1844 until the death of the Comte de Chambord in 1883.

Froissart (froi'särt; F. pron. frwä-sär'), Jean. Born at Valenciennes, 1337; died at Chimay about 1410. A celebrated French chronicler. Nothing is known of his family or early life beyond the few facts to be gleaned from his own writings. In 1360 he was welcomed to England by his countrywoman Queen Philippa of Hainaut, wife of Edward III. In 1366 he visited Scotland, and in May, 1368, he was at Milan in the company of Petrarch and Chaucer. About 1372, after several years spent in travel, Froissart decided to enter the church. The period of his activity as a chronicler extends from 1367 to 1400. His great work is the "Chronique de France, d'Angleterre, d'Ecosse et d'Espagne," relating the events of history from 1325 till 1400. It was published before the close of the 15th century, and was thus among the first books to be printed. One of the 6 editions of the 16th century was by Denis Sauvage, historian to Henry II. of France. The best editions in modern times are by Kervyn de Lettenhove, in 25 volumes (1867–77), and by Simeon Luce, incomplete, in 8 volumes (1869–88).

Froissart, though inferior to Joinville, and though far less remarkable as a poet than Eustache Deschamps, can fairly hold his own with Deschamps and Machault, while he has the advantage of being easily accessible. The later part of his life he has never given up to history, he is not quite so voluminous in verse as his less famous rivals. Yet, if the attribution to him of the "Cour d'Amour" and the "Trésor Amoureux" be correct, he has left some 40,000 or 50,000 lines. The bulk of his work consists of long poems in the allegorical courtship of the time, interspersed with shorter lyrical pieces in the prevailing forms. One of these poems, the Banson de la Rose, "Méliador," is because of its autobiographical details; and some shorter pieces approaching more nearly to the Italian style, "Le Joli au Florin," "Le Joli Buisson de Jonece," et du Levrier," etc., are sprightly and agreeable enough.
Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 104.

He (Sir Frederick Frolic) is a man of quality, who can fight at need with small but keenness of nerve, but whose customary occupation is the pursuit of pleasure without dignity and without reflection.
Gosse, Seventeenth Century Studies.

Fromentin (frō-mon-tan'), Eugène. Born at St.-Maurice, near La Rochelle, Oct. 24, 1820; died there, Aug. 27, 1876. A noted French genre painter and writer. Pupil of Remond and Cabat. He visited Algiers 1846–48 and 1852–53, and produced many sketches from which he painted his characteristic pictures of Oriental life. He was also the author of "Dominique," a successful novel, and of works on art and travel. He was awarded a second-class medal in 1849 and 1857, and a first-class in 1859. He became a member of the Legion of Honor in 1858.

Fronde (frond), The. [F., lit. 'a sling.'] In French history, the name of a party which during the minority of Louis XIV. waged civil war against the court party, on account of the humiliations inflicted on the high nobility and the heavy fiscal impositions laid on the people. The movement began with the opposition of the parliament of Paris to the measures of the minister Mazarin, and was successfully called by one of his supporters there "the war of the fronde," in allusion to that of the sling then common among the street-boys of Paris. The contest continued from 1648 to 1653, during which Mazarin was driven from power, but soon restored. The opposition to him had degenerated into a struggle between the court and party strife, whence the name frondeur became a term of political reproach.

Frontenac (frônt-näk'), Comte Louis de Buade de, Born in France, 1621; died at Quebec, Nov. 28, 1698. A French colonial officer, governor of Canada 1672–82 and 1689–98.

Frontenac was full of faults; but it is not through these that his memory has survived him. He was domineering, arbitrary, intolerant of opposition, irascible, vehement in prejudice, often wayward, perverse, and jealous: a perse cutor of those who crossed him; yet capable, by fits, of moderation and a magnanimous lenity; and gifted with a rare charm — not always exerted — to win the attachment of men: versed in books, polished in courts and salons, without fear, incapable of repose, keen and broad of sight, clear in judgment, prompt in decision, fruitful in resources, unshaken when others despaired, a sure breeder of storms in time of peace, but in time of calamity and danger a tower of strength. His early career in America was beset with ire and enmity; but admiration and gratitude hailed him at its close: for it was he who saved the colony and led it triumphant from an abyss of ruin.

Parkman, Discovery of the Great West, p. 47.

Frontino (fron-tē'nō). The name of the horse which Brunello stole from Sacripant and gave to Rogero, and on which the latter overthrew all his opponents. He is mentioned both by Boiardo and Ariosto in the Orlando poems.

Frontinus (fron-tī'nus), Sextus Julius. Died about 103 A. D. A Roman military officer, engineer, and tactician. He wrote "Strategematica" (a work on strategy, in four books), "De aquis urbis Romæ," etc.

Fronto (fron'tō), Marcus Cornelius. Born at Cirta, Numidia: died about 175 A. D. A Roman rhetorician and orator. A collection of his letters was edited by Naber in 1867.

The most characteristic figure of this time is the rhetorician M. Cornelius Fronto of Cirta (probably a. 100–175 A. D.), who held under Hadrian a conspicuous position as an orator, and under Antoninus Pius taught M. Aurelius and L. Verus. He was consul 143 A. D. We possess by him above all the greater part of his correspondence with M. Aurelius both as their apparent and as emperor. The rhetorician appears in these letters conceited, insipid, laboured, with little genius and much want of taste and pretence, but well informed and an enthusiastic admirer of early Roman literature, which he zealously endeavours to make known generally. But of the same time his character appears honourable, upright, and independent; he never abuses his influential position, is faithful as a husband and friend, and gives fatherly advice to his pupils, whose brilliant lustre surrounded his name with a brilliant lustre.
Teuffel und Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), II. 213.

Front Range (frunt rānj). The easternmost range of the Rocky Mountains in the State of Colorado.

Front Royal. A place in the Shenandoah valley, West Virginia, where Stonewall Jackson captured the command of Colonel J. R. Kenly, May 23, 1862.
